

A BRIEF SURVEY OF
BRITISH HISTORY

TOWNSEND WARNER

Elizabeth Wilson

117
Bunff Academy

Bunce

Elizabeth

David II

Stewart King

David II

Bunff Academy

Bunff Academy

Class A

Richard I

Edward IV

Edward V

A BRIEF SURVEY OF
BRITISH HISTORY

BLACKIE & SON LIMITED

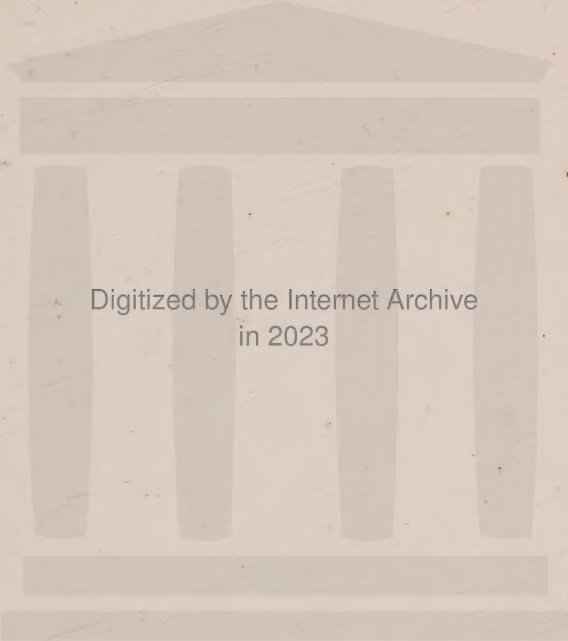

50 Old Bailey, LONDON
17 Stanhope Street, GLASGOW

BLACKIE & SON (INDIA) LIMITED

Warwick House, Fort Street, BOMBAY

BLACKIE & SON (CANADA) LIMITED

1118 Bay Street, TORONTO

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023

Photo, Valentine

STONEHENGE

A building connected with ancient British worship

A BRIEF SURVEY OF BRITISH HISTORY

BY

GEORGE TOWNSEND WARNER, M.A.

Sometime Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge late Master of the Modern Side in Harrow School //

WITH REVISIONS AND EXTENSIONS TO 1925

BLACKIE & SON LIMITED
LONDON AND GLASGOW

Printed in Great Britain by Blackie & Son, Limited, Glasgow

PREFACE

I have aimed, in this book, at making a simple selection of the most important factors, or chain of events, in each period, and have treated these in more detail, to the exclusion of others which seem to me less characteristic of the period. It has sometimes been taken for granted that the right method of teaching history is to lay down a preliminary groundwork of facts and dates and miscellaneous scraps of important information, before making an attempt to awake interest in the connexion of historical events by the process of reasoning. The principle is somewhat akin to the mode of teaching languages by grinding over grammar and accidence; it is at any rate time-honoured. But the value of history as an educational subject, even for the young, cannot, I think, be fully realized, unless some stress is placed upon the sequence of cause and effect, so as to exercise not merely the memory but the reason.

Understanding is a far more attractive process than merely learning; young minds are by nature curious, and are receptive enough of an explanation, provided it be simple; and the difficulties of remembering are much lessened when events in history are presented, not as isolated, but as the causes or consequences of other events. It is this object that I have tried to keep before me.

G. TOWNSEND WARNER.

NOTE TO 1926 EDITION

The necessity for re-setting Warner's Brief Survey in new type has provided the opportunity for adjusting one or two minor details. In the opening pages a slight adjustment has been made to avoid perpetuating the now outworn view that language connotes race. The concluding chapter, "The Great War and After", has been brought down to date.

CONTENTS

CHAP.	Page
I. The Beginnings - - - - -	7
II. The Coming of Christianity - - - - -	13
III. The Union of England under the Kings of Wessex. Alfred and the Danes - - - - -	17
IV. The Fall of the Saxons. England under Foreign Rule. Danes and Normans - - - - -	23
V. Normans and English: Feudalism - - - - -	28
VI. The Worst Evils of Feudalism, and the Restoration of Order - - - - -	35
VII. English Kings Abroad. Richard the Crusader - - - - -	40
VIII. Magna Carta; and the Makings of Parliament - - - - -	45
IX. The Beginnings of Scotland - - - - -	50
X. An Early Great Britain and its Failure - - - - -	56
XI. The Story of Scottish Independence. Wallace and Robert Bruce - - - - -	61
XII. The Hundred Years' War. The Worth of the English Archer - - - - -	67
XIII. The Black Death and the Serfs - - - - -	75
XIV. Wyclif and the Lollards - - - - -	80
XV. The Wars of the Roses - - - - -	85
XVI. The Reformation in England. First Period: England casts off the Power of the Pope - - - - -	93
XVII. The Reformation in England. Second Period: Eng- land becomes Protestant - - - - -	99
XVIII. The Unlucky House of Stuart - - - - -	103
XIX. Mary Stuart and the Reformation in Scotland - - - - -	111
XX. Royal Marriages - - - - -	117
XXI. Elizabeth and the Armada - - - - -	124
XXII. The Stuarts and their Difficulties - - - - -	129
XXIII. War between King and Parliament - - - - -	134
XXIV. Britain Governed by an Army - - - - -	141
XXV. From the Restoration to the Revolution - - - - -	146
XXVI. William III in Britain - - - - -	152
XXVII. War with France. Marlborough - - - - -	156

CHAP.		Page
XXVIII.	The Union of England and Scotland - - -	164
XXIX.	The "'Fifteen" and the "'Forty-five" - - -	169
XXX.	The Growth of the Empire in the Eighteenth Century. William Pitt - - -	177
	i. The Winning of our Indian Empire - - -	179
	ii. American Colonies - - -	183
	iii. British Power at Sea - - -	188
XXXI.	The French Revolution and Napoleon - - -	193
XXXII.	The Industrial Revolution - - -	200
XXXIII.	Crown and Parliament. The Reform Bill - - -	206
XXXIV.	The Epoch of Reform - - -	212
XXXV.	Crimean War. Indian Mutiny - - -	218
XXXVI.	Great Parliamentary Leaders - - -	227
XXXVII.	British Power in Africa - - -	233
XXXVIII.	The New Colonial System - - -	238
XXXIX.	The March of Events - - -	244
XL.	The Great War and After - - -	248
	Synopsis - - -	261
	Chronological Table - - -	280

LIST OF PLATES

Stonehenge - - - - -	Frontispiece
Bede's Chair, Jarrow - - - - -	12
Reduced Facsimile of a Page of Domesday Book - - -	31
Reduced Facsimile of a portion of "Magna Carta" - - -	46
Coronation Chair, in Westminster Abbey - - -	63
John Wyclif - - - - -	78
Fountains Abbey, Yorks, one of the Monasteries dissolved by Henry VIII - - - - -	94
Mary Queen of Scots - - - - -	111
The Defeat of the Spanish Armada - - - - -	126
Reduced Facsimile of the Warrant for the Execution of Charles I - - - - -	143
Reduced Facsimile of the Order that led to the Massacre of Glencoe - - - - -	158
William Pitt, the Great Commoner - - - - -	175
A Relic of Trafalgar: the Victory - - - - -	190
Hand-loom Weaving at Spitalfields - - - - -	207
Ruins of the Residency, Lucknow - - - - -	223
The Governor's Palace, Khartoum - - - - -	238

A BRIEF SURVEY OF BRITISH HISTORY

I.—THE BEGINNINGS

The history of Britain, so far as it is written, begins with the invasions of the Romans under Julius Cæsar. There is little in the way of written records about our country before that time, but learned men have been able to discover something about the people before the Romans came. They tell us that our island was inhabited by people who belonged to the Celtic group of humanity, akin to the Gauls. These people were good agriculturists and were skilled in many industrial arts, such as weaving, metal working, and the making of beautiful ornaments; they manufactured enamels of various colours to decorate bronze helmets, shields, and armlets. They did not make a practice of keeping written records, but depended on their bards to memorize and recount the great doings of chieftains and tribes. So there is not much we can know of their detailed history. We know, however, that the chief prevailing language of the island was British, the parent of modern Welsh. In the north, present-day Scotland, Gaelic was probably spoken as well as British.

We may dismiss the Roman occupation very shortly, for most of what the Romans did perished when they left. After Julius Cæsar's expeditions (55-54 B.C.), it was close on a hundred years before they sent another. The Britons could not resist them. Piece by piece the Romans subdued the larger part of the island, although one violent British revolt, led by Queen Boadicea, nearly destroyed the Roman power. It was put down and the queen slain, but not before she had sacked and burned the three chief Roman towns—Colchester, St. Albans, and London. The Romans did not occupy and "Romanize" the north—now Scotland—the chief tribes of which were the Caledonians, in the centre, and the Picts, in the north. They, however, held military posts in the Lowlands for various periods. The wall of Antoninus was constructed about A.D. 142 between the Forth and Clyde; but soon after A.D. 180 the southern part of present Scotland was abandoned. Hadrian's wall between the Solway and the Tyne then became the northern boundary of Roman Britain.

During the Roman occupation of 350 years Roman civilization was absorbed by the people of south Britain, who came to regard their country as part of the great Roman Empire and themselves as Romans. When the army in Britain was withdrawn for the protection of Italy, the Britons were helpless to defend themselves from invasion from the north or from the sea.

From the north the Picts and Scots raided the country. The Scots, who have since given their name to Scotland, had their head-quarters in the north-east of Ireland and settlements in the south-west of Scotland. In their extremity the Britons invited the help of warriors from the northern shores of Germany. The Saxons accepted the invitation, but instead of

ROMAN BRITAIN

Roads Forests
Fens

defending the Britons from Picts and Scots, they began to take possession of the country for themselves.

It is said that the first comers were commanded by two leaders, Hengist and Horsa. Horsa was killed in battle just after their arrival, but Hengist established himself in Kent. He was followed by other leaders and other bands, some being Jutes from Jutland or Denmark, others Saxons from the land by the mouth of the Elbe, and others Angles from Schleswig. These were all similar peoples who spoke what has turned by degrees into our own tongue—English.

They were fierce warriors, and the Britons could not stand before them. They worshipped heathen gods; they hated and destroyed towns. We read of the Saxon chiefs who stormed the fortress of Anderida: “Ælla and Cissa beset Anderida, and slew all that were therein; nor was there afterwards one Briton left”. The Britons fled westwards before them, leaving behind little trace of their language. As each piece of the country was torn from them, it was formed into a new Saxon kingdom. The names of our shires tell us this: Essex, Sussex, Wessex, are the settlements of the East, South, and West Saxons; Norfolk and Suffolk, of the North and South folk of the Angles; Northumbria, the realm north of the Humber; Mercia, the “march” or border country next to the Britons.

The first invaders had come in 449; it was not till 120 years later that the Britons were forced completely to the west. A great victory at Dyrham, in Gloucestershire, let Ceawlin, King of the West Saxons, reach the Severn; and another at Chester, some thirty years later, extended the power of Ethelfrith, King of Northum-

The Invasion of the Saxons, 449.

Battles of Dyrham, 577;
and Chester, 613.

bria, to the western sea. Henceforward the Britons or Welsh ("foreigners"), as the invaders called them, were split into three separate parts, dwelling in Cornwall, Wales, and Strathclyde, the last being most of the western coast between the Ribble and the Clyde.

So far we have looked at the Saxons as a wild, warlike race; but these wild, warlike men are our own ancestors, and we must see more Saxon Institutions. closely what we have got from them. One thing has been mentioned already—our language. But there is more than that. These rude Saxons, when they landed under Hengist and Horsa at Ebbsfleet, brought with them the beginnings of many of the institutions under which our country is governed to-day.

The first thing to remark is that the Saxons were a people who thought much of freedom. The Freedom. power of a king or chief was very much limited; they said themselves, "the people had as many rights against him as he had against them".

Following on this we have their love for governing themselves by an assembly. It was an assembly of all the free men—the "folk moot"¹—that Government by Assembly. chose the king or leader. It was in the folk moot that all grave matters were discussed and decided; in this assembly we are told that "no man dictated; he might persuade, but he could not command". And the Saxons carried their love for assemblies further. Not only did they have "folk moots", which, when the first small kingdoms in England were changed into shires, became "shire moots", but they afterwards set up "hundred moots" and "township moots" for the smaller subdivisions called hundreds and townships. These assemblies not only decided local questions, but formed courts of justice. This is not unlike the system of assemblies we now have—the District and County Councils, with the sovereign assembly of Parliament at the head.

¹ Moot means a meeting.

We find also the beginnings of a Parliament among the Saxons. As the kingdoms grew too large for all the freemen to assemble, the place of The Witan. the folk moot was taken by the Assembly of the Wise Men, or the Witan. In it sat the “aldermen”, the rulers of the shires, and the “thegns” or chiefs of the king’s body-guard, who were the nobles and great land-owners of the time; and in later days, when the Church was established in England, the archbishops and bishops sat there too. This body somewhat resembled our House of Lords; it differed indeed from Parliament, for there were no commons to represent the people. But it wielded many of the powers which Parliament wields now. It made laws; it was consulted about affairs of state, on questions of peace and war, of treaties, of religion; it could elect a king, it could depose a king.

And so when in later days we find Parliament refusing to allow Charles I. to make laws and govern at his will, or interfering in questions of religion as it did in Henry VIII.’s days, or offering the crown of England as it offered it to William III., or deposing a king as it deposed Richard II., we may remember that it was using powers which had belonged to the Saxon Witan.

BEDE'S CHAIR, JARROW

II.—THE COMING OF CHRISTIANITY.

The Saxon invasion seemed a change for the worse. Under Roman rule the Britons had been united, civilized, and Christian. The Saxons divided the country afresh, and brought with them wars and violence; they allowed towns to go into decay; they were heathens, worshipping Woden and Thor. Under them Britain was for a time lost to Europe. It had been a prosperous Roman province, but ruin came over it. Rome, however, was to conquer it afresh; this time the conquest was not to be made by Roman legions for a Roman emperor, but by Roman missionaries for the Roman Church.

It happened that Ethelbert, King of Kent, married Bertha, a Christian princess from France. The pope at this time, Gregory the Great, saw that this offered a chance of converting the heathen Saxons. Every one knows the familiar story, how, passing through the slave-market at Rome, he had seen some fair-haired slaves standing there; he asked whence they came, and was told they were Angles—"Not Angles but Angels" was his answer. "And who is their King?" "Ælla", was the reply. "Alleluia shall be sung in the realm of Ælla", said Gregory. When he became pope he made up his mind to keep the promise so quaintly uttered. So he sent Augustine and a band of forty missionaries to Britain. In 597 they landed at Ebbsfleet, the very place where Hengist and his Saxons had landed a hundred and fifty years before.

The Mission of Augustine, 597.

King Ethelbert was soon converted, and his subjects followed his example, so that Kent was the first Saxon kingdom to become Christian. Then, just as a Frankish princess had given the chance of sending a mission to Kent, so a Kentish princess, Ethelburga, who married Edwin, King of Northumbria, carried another missionary, Paulinus, to the north. The last great stand for heathendom was made by Penda, King of Mercia, but after thirteen years of fighting he was killed in battle, and soon after his death his subjects also became Christians.

Meanwhile the Roman monks were not the only missionaries at work. Britain and Ireland had been converted to Christianity in the Roman days, and from the Celtic peoples had come a fresh stream of missionaries. St. Aidan, a Scot, came from the Abbey of Iona and set up a monastery at Lindisfarne. His aim was "to teach no otherwise than he and his followers lived", and the simple, godly habits of his monks showed everyone what Christians should be.

Unfortunately, though the Celtic and Roman missionaries were striving for the same good object, they could not quite agree. The Celtic Church did not acknowledge the supremacy of the Roman Church, and the two differed about some small points. One was the date on which Easter should fall. In 664 a Synod was held at Whitby to consider the matter. The Scottish bishop Colman supported the practice which his church had received from St. Columba, its founder; Wilfred, the abbot of Ripon, took the Roman side. Oswy, the king, asked Colman if the keys of heaven had been given to Columba, as they had been given to Peter. Colman replied, "No". "Then," said the king, "if Peter is the door-keeper I will never contradict him, lest, when I come to the gates, there should be none to open them"—and so he decided for the Roman practice. His decision was important. Had he decided the other way it would have cut Britain off from joining with the rest of Europe in matters of religion, and might have left us without the civilization and learning which Rome gave us.

The Church was now one in practice and belief, but it was not united or organized. As the country was divided into several kingdoms men did not speak of one church, but of many. The work of uniting all churchmen under one church and one head was done by a Greek monk, Theodore of Tarsus, who was chosen by the pope to be Archbishop of Canterbury. He divided the land into dioceses, gave each bishop his own district to manage, and held national synods in which all who came thought of themselves no longer as men of Northumbria, Kent, or Wessex, but as members of one united church.

The Church
United and Organized by Theodore, 667.

If we look for the results of the conversion upon our country, the first is here. A united church gave the example for a united people; union under one archbishop accustomed men to think of union under one king; if they were alike in religion, they might well be alike in law and government. And we shall see that this soon came to pass; the old petty kingdoms died out or were absorbed, until one kingdom—that of Wessex—became the kingdom of England.

A National Church an Example of a United Nation.

The Church offered an example of union; it also offered an example of peace. Among the Saxons men had been chiefly thought of for their valour. Theirs was the rule of might; little was thought of right. Even murder might be atoned for by payment of a fine. But the monks and parish priests lived peaceful lives: they taught that doing one's duty at home was better than seeking adventures abroad; that it was better to forgive an enemy than to overcome him; that a man should strive to be loved rather than feared. Thus the Church began a better system of law in England. Instead of compensating for acts of violence by money, it made wrong-doers atone for them by penance.

Peace and Morality.

To the Church, too, we owe the beginnings of our learning. The Abbey of Whitby found shelter for a cowherd who had become a monk. This The Church and Learning; Caedmon, 664. man was Caedmon, the first English poet. His great religious poem seemed to those of his time to be sent direct from heaven. "Others after him strove to compose religious poems, but none could vie with him, for he learnt not the art of poetry from men, or of men, but from God." Bede,—the Bede, d. 753. 'Venerable Bede' is the respectful title that has been bestowed on him,—another monk, is a type of the great teachers whom the Church gave us. "My constant pleasure", he says, "lay in learning, or teaching, or writing." At his school of Jarrow six hundred monks learned from him. He was our first historian; and, indeed, it is he who tells us almost all we know of this time. And yet more than this, he translated into English St. John's Gospel, devoting the last days of his life to the task. He was urged to rest from the work that was killing him, but he refused, saying, "I don't want my boys to read a lie, or to work to no purpose when I am gone". When the last chapter of the Gospel was finished the great scholar died.

Another, and a very different type, from among the men the Church gave us was Dunstan. He too was a monk, but while Bede was a scholar, Dunstan was not only a scholar but a statesman also.

He was the adviser of two kings, and practically regent for a third; he went with the king on campaigns against the Danes; he kept the royal treasure. As in addition he was Archbishop of Canterbury, we can understand that he was much the most powerful man in the kingdom. He was the first man to be great both as a cleric and as a statesman. But there were many who followed in his steps. In fact, until the reign of Henry VIII. the greatest ministers of our kings were almost always clerics. They were far more able and enlightened than the ignorant warriors and nobles who formed the king's court, and they did a great work for England. As we shall see later, one of these church-statesmen, Stephen Langton, had much to do with obtaining for us our Magna Carta.

Statesmen;
Dunstan,
Archbishop of Canterbury, 960.

The Church, then, gave us the beginnings of our national unity; she did much to give us peace at home and a better sense of what was lawful and right; she gave us scholars, and she gave us statesmen.

III.—THE UNION OF ENGLAND UNDER THE KINGS OF WESSEX. ALFRED AND THE DANES.

Out of the number of little Saxon kingdoms which existed at first in England, it happened that now one and then another grew more powerful than its neighbours, and held a vague kind of sway over the rest. First of all Northumbria obtained such a position, and afterwards Mercia. When

Rise of Wessex.

this was so, the King of Northumbria or Mercia was called a Bretwalda, or overlord. Thus King Edwin of Northumbria and King Offa of Mercia were called Bretwaldas. In the year 800, however, a new kingdom rose to the chief power. This was Wessex. Egbert, its king, first subdued Kent and Sussex, and thus made himself master of England south of the Thames; then he attacked the Mercians, and defeated and slew their king in battle, so the Mercians became his subjects. Soon afterwards Northumbria submitted to him also. By all England was united under Egbert

Thus under Egbert England was united. With him begins the history of our kings, for with four exceptions¹ every king who has sat on the throne of England till the present day has had Egbert's blood in his veins. So the overlordship of Wessex is of far greater interest in our history than that of any other kingdom which came before it.

It is likely, however, that Wessex might have risen only to fall again, like Northumbria and Mercia, but for an event which forced the necessity of union upon all England. This event is the coming of the Danes.

The Danish invasion was much like the invasion of the Saxons themselves, and the new-comers inflicted Danish inroads on the Saxons almost the same evils that began, 787. the Saxons had inflicted on the Britons. At first the Danes were mere plunderers, landing from their ships, sacking monasteries and burning towns. At the approach of an enemy they embarked again and made off with their spoil. By degrees they grew bolder; they came in greater numbers, and ventured farther inland; they even began to settle in the country, and so successful were they that by 869 they had subdued Northumbria and East Anglia, and seemed likely to become masters of the whole country. The kingdom of Wessex alone was left to resist them. Fortunately at this time there appeared a Saxon hero-king who was equal to the task.

¹ The exceptions are Canute, the two Harolds, and William the Conqueror.

This was Alfred, grandson of Egbert. Even before he became king, while yet a boy of eighteen, he had helped his brother in a year's hard warfare against the Danes. No fewer than Alfred, 871-901. six battles were fought, and it was not till the last that the men of Wessex were able to win a great victory at Ashdown. In this battle Alfred was held to have won the chief honours by his skill and bravery.

The Danes were driven back for the time, but they were not conquered. Early in Alfred's reign a great host of them under ^{DANE} Guthrum poured into Wessex. They took London and Winchester, and defeated Alfred again and again, till he was forced to flee to a marshy spot in Somersetshire, called the isle of Athelney. But though all seemed lost, Alfred did not despair. He gathered the men of Devon and Somerset, and, marching against Guthrum, defeated him at Ethandun, drove him to take refuge in his stockade at Chippenham, surrounded him there, and compelled him to submit by starving him out.

The treaty of Wedmore, which Alfred and Guthrum made, divided England into two parts by a line drawn, roughly speaking, from Chester to Lon- Treaty of don. South and west of this Alfred ruled; Wedmore, 878. the north and east remained to Guthrum and the Danes. But Guthrum had to acknowledge Alfred as lord, and to become a Christian; and as the Danes were not very different from the Saxons in race and speech, even the inhabitants of the Danelagh—the district in which the Danes held sway—were able again to enjoy peace. More than once in his reign Alfred had to take up arms afresh against hordes of invaders, but he always overcame them. A Norse poet sang—

“They got hard blows instead of shillings,
And the axe’s weight instead of tribute”.

So they began to think that Alfred was best left alone.

Alfred showed that he was a bold warrior by overcoming the Danes; he also showed that he was a wise statesman by not trying to do too much. He saved Wessex; and though he had for a time to give up the north and east, it was only for a time. His sons and grandsons were destined to recover all that had been lost. Had Alfred done no more than to save the English from being overthrown altogether, we should remember him as one of the greatest of our kings. But he did many other things besides overcoming the Danes.

As to-day we think of the British navy as the chief among our many national glories, we should remember that we owe the beginnings of this navy to Alfred. Although the Saxons had been great sailors before they came to Britain, yet when they came they lost their love for the sea. But Alfred saw that the best way to keep off the Danes was by fighting them at sea, and so he built ships bigger and faster than the Danish ships, took into his service Frisian, Welsh, and even Danish sailors to teach his men, and at last was able to guard the shores of England more or less effectually from foreign invaders. He was the first to show what we all recognize now, that if Britain is supreme at sea she has little to fear.

Alfred deserves to be remembered for what he did to keep his realm safe; yet no less honour is due for what he did to make it well-governed. Alfred as a Lawgiver and a Teacher. He set in order the laws, and took such good care that they should be kept, that in later days, when troubles came again, men longed for the "laws of King Alfred". He was a scholar, and wished to teach his people. He desired that every freeborn youth "should abide at his book till he can well understand English writing". In order that they should have books to read, he himself translated books for them—books on religion, on geography, on history; and he caused to be written, and perhaps himself helped to write, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. Thus, as Caedmon is the father of English poetry, Alfred is the father of English prose.

In 901 Alfred died, but his work did not die with him. His son, Edward the Elder, reconquered the Danelagh as far as the Humber. His Alfred's Sons and Grand-sons, 901-955. grandsons restored the Saxon power over Northumbria, and even induced the Scots to accept the Saxon king as father and lord. Thus England was again united under a Saxon king. The Danes had been beaten; they had settled down quietly under Saxon rule; they had intermarried with the Saxons, had grown like them in speech, and were hardly to be told as a separate race. All seemed well. It was hardly possible to imagine a better sign for the future than this, that Edred, the youngest of Alfred's three grandsons, was chosen king by a Witan in which Saxons, Welshmen, and Danes all sat peaceably side by side as members of one realm. But the Danish invasions were not yet over. Fresh troubles were not very far off.

IV.—THE FALL OF THE SAXONS. ENGLAND UNDER FOREIGN RULE. DANES AND NORMANS.

Alfred himself stands out as the towering landmark of the period we have followed. But his greatness is apt to mislead us. He does not stand alone. He is only one of a race of kings, The Great Saxon Kings. all most capable rulers, who, were Alfred out of sight, might each deserve to be called a hero. It is not too much to say, that for nearly one hundred and eighty years (800–978) every king save one that sat on the throne of Wessex deserved to be called a great man; and, in addition, during the last forty years these kings had the advice of the greatest Saxon statesman—Dunstan. This is the Golden Age of Saxon England; but the period which follows offers a sad contrast.

It opens ominously with murder. The young king Edward, riding past his stepmother's castle at Corfe, halted at the door and asked for a cup of wine. The treacherous queen brought it herself, and while the king was drinking it, made one of her men stab him in the back, that her own son Ethelred might get the throne. For eight-and-thirty years England was to regret that deed, for Ethelred's reign proved one of the worst in her history.

Ethelred's name of the Unready or Redeless—that is to say, "The Man of Ill-Counsel"—aptly describes him. He was selfish, idle, weak. He allowed Ethelred, 978–1016. his nobles to quarrel among themselves. The Danes saw the weakness of the realm and began their raids afresh. Ethelred was foolish enough to reverse the plan which Alfred had followed with such success.

Instead of hard blows he gave them shillings, and tried to buy them off with the Danegeld, a tax which he made his luckless subjects pay. This of course only attracted fresh swarms of Danes. One band followed another, all clamouring for Danegeld. Then Ethelred, having by his first act brought the Danes into England, made them lasting foes by his second. He had recourse to treachery. Suddenly, in a time of truce, he caused all the Danes on whom he could lay hands to be murdered. This "Massacre of St. 1002. Brice's Day" drew down on him the whole might of the Danish kingdom, for among the victims so foully slain were the sister of the Danish king, Sweyn, and her husband.

Ethelred, like all weak kings, was a prey to bad favourites. The man he chose as his friend was a prince of traitors—Edric. Almost the first act of this friend was to betray his master by persuading the Witan to offer the throne of England to the Danish king. London alone stoutly held out for Ethelred, till it heard that the miserable man had deserted his post and had fled to Normandy. The nation then made Edmund, his son, king. He was young and brave, as his name "Ironside" tells us, and might have driven out Canute, who led the Danes. Five battles he fought, and was successful in them all; but in the sixth, Edric, who had come over to his side, deserted him again on the battle-field, and caused his defeat. Not content with that, a year later the traitor Edric got Edmund murdered, and in despair the nation chose the Dane Canute as their king.

Thus all Alfred's work was overthrown. Yet Canute, though a foreign conqueror, was a good king. He ruled sternly, but fairly; he gave England the peace which was sadly needed. He married Ethelred's widow, and so joined himself to the old royal family; he employed English and Danes alike; and he slew the treacherous Edric. He felt so certain of the loyalty of his new subjects that he was able to send home all his Danish army, save a small body-guard. This shows us that he was loved, just as the old story of his rebuke to the flattering courtiers who urged him to forbid the tide to come any farther, shows us that he was wise.

Canute
the Dane,
1016-1035.

Neither of Canute's sons lived long, so that in 1042 the Witan had to choose a fresh king. The choice fell on Edward, second son of Ethelred the Unready.

Edward, the Confessor, as he was called, though a pious, well-meaning man, was destined to bring England under another foreign power. He had been brought up in Normandy, and he was much fonder of Normans than of his own subjects. He made a Norman Archbishop of Canterbury, and promoted others to be bishops and earls; worse than this, he had even given some sort of promise to William, the Duke of Normandy, that he would leave him the crown of England at his death. All this favouring of foreigners made Englishmen very angry.

Edward, the Confessor,
1042-1066.

When Edward died, leaving only a great-nephew of ten years old to follow him, the Witan, anxious for a strong ruler, and for one who would hate the Normans instead of favouring them, put

Harold,
1066.

Harold, son of the Saxon Earl Godwin, on the throne. But William of Normandy, as we have seen, had already been aiming at the crown. And further, unluckily for Harold, it had happened that he had once been wrecked on the coast of Normandy and thrown into prison. Before the duke would let him go, he had made him swear that he would do his best to get William chosen king on Edward's death. William now declared that Harold was false to his oath, and made ready an army of Normans to invade England and dethrone him.

Even at this fatal moment, while William was preparing his fleet and mustering thousands of soldiers, not from Normandy alone but from all parts of France, England was not united. Harold's brother, Tostig, whom he had driven into exile, suddenly landed in Northumbria, bringing with him the King of Norway and a host of Norse warriors. Harold had to march north to fight them. He met them at Stamford Bridge and utterly defeated them. Tostig and the Norwegian king were both slain. The vast army which came in three hundred ships was so shattered that twenty-four were enough to carry it away.

It was a great victory, but it was Harold's last. While he was away, the wind shifted from the north-west to the south, and Duke William was able to land with, it is said, a hundred thousand men at his back. "Had I been there," cried Harold, "they had never made good their landing." He hurried his army southward, but even now, with the enemy on an English shore, Edwin and Morcar, Earls of Northumbria and Mercia, would not help him, but loitered behind till too late.

The battle that was to decide England's fate was fought near Hastings on the 14th October, 1066. Harold drew up his men on a hill, and strengthened his position with entrenchments. His soldiers fought on foot; his body-guard in the centre were armed mostly with two-handed axes or long swords, but on the wings he had some hastily-raised levies, some armed with clubs, some with spears, some with scythes. The duke had a splendid force of mail-clad cavalry and a number of archers.

The Normans began the attack, but neither the arrows nor the charges of horsemen could shake the English. Man after man of William's best knights went down under the English axes. The day wore on towards afternoon, and still Harold held his ground. Had he had with him the warriors who had fallen at Stamford Bridge, or even the lingering forces of Edwin and Morcar, he might have won. But suddenly some of his ill-trained levies ruined him. The duke pretended to be retreating. Many of the English left their position to pursue the foe whom they thought beaten. William ordered his men to wheel about and charge. The English, caught in the open ground, were no match for the Norman cavalry, who cut them down with ease. Then William led his knights to a fresh charge on the body-guard who had stood firm by Harold. Although desperately outnumbered, these stood firm till Harold himself was mortally wounded by an arrow in the eye. Then at length the wall of shields was broken; the English guard were overpowered and slain where they stood; and as the sun was setting, Duke William found himself the victor.

Shakespeare has written—

“ This England never did—nor never shall—Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror
But when it first did help to wound itself”.

The period of English history which we have followed in this chapter gives us a striking example of this. Twice in ninety years was England at a conqueror's feet. It was not for want of valour. None could be braver than Edmund Ironside or Harold. None could do more than give their lives for their country, and the English army at Hastings poured out its blood like water for its king. It was not the open enemy that was to be feared, but the familiar friend; not the Dane or Norman, but the recreant Englishman. The falseness of Ethelred, the treachery of Edric, the rebellion of Tostig, the half-heartedness of Edwin and Morcar—these were the true causes of the Saxon downfall.

V.—NORMANS AND ENGLISH: FEUDALISM.

After the battle of Hastings William marched slowly towards London. He might have expected that the country of Alfred and Edmund William I., 1066-1087. Ironside would not submit after one defeat only. But the English were still quarrelling among themselves. And so, though the Witan chose Edgar Atheling, the grandson of Edmund Ironside, to succeed Harold as king, yet in a short time they found it hopeless to resist further. William offered the Crown by the Witan. An embassy, with Edgar himself at the head of it, came to William and offered him the crown. Thus William was able to say that he ruled, not as a conqueror, but as the lawful king, elected by the Witan.

This was a great advantage, but William was still in a very difficult position. He had two things to do: the first, to subdue the English thoroughly; the second, to keep his own Norman followers contented and obedient, to reward them, and yet not make them so strong that they could revolt against him. He had, in fact, to keep himself master of both Normans and English alike.

His first stroke was to declare that all those who had fought against him at Hastings were rebels, and that their estates were forfeited to him. Thus he became master of almost all the land in the south of England; and when in later years the English in the north and west rebelled against him, he punished them by taking away their lands also. These vast estates he used to reward his Norman followers. And even when an Englishman's estates were not taken from him, he was obliged to pay a large fine, and to admit that the land was really the king's and not his own; that he was the king's tenant and vassal, and therefore bound to serve him.

Thus was set up in England what is called the "Feudal System". To understand this we must fix our eyes upon the land, for the land was the basis of it all. The king at the head was the owner of all the land. He granted large estates to his nobles and barons, who were called tenants-in-chief, and who were bound by these grants of land to fight for the king if he called on them to do so. The tenants-in-chief in their turn granted parts of their estates to their followers, who were also bound in their turn to obey the tenants-in-chief as their superiors. And below all classes of free tenants were a vast number of serfs who had very small holdings of land, some five, ten, twenty, or thirty acres, and who had in return for this to work upon their lord's land, and to cultivate it for him.

Thus all men were divided into ranks. We may think of it all as a sort of pyramid; hosts of serfs at the bottom owing obedience to their lords who held the land; next a large number of minor tenants owing obedience to the tenants-in-chief; and then a small

To keep down the English.

Feudal System; Land.

number of tenants-in-chief, the earls and barons, owing obedience to the one king at the top. It was the land which bound them all together. Everyone had rights or duties which depended on the way he was connected with the land. The king was the master of all because he was master of all the land; the barons were his "vassals", subject to him, because they held his land; but they were lords over the serfs, because these did not hold land as freemen at all.

It is easy to see that the English came off badly in this arrangement. As the Norman friends of the Many English king were put at the top, the English become Serfs. naturally sank to the bottom. Those who in days before the Conquest had been free, though they were owners only of very small estates, now found themselves reduced to being serfs, or, as they were sometimes called, villeins.

We must see what this meant for them. In the first place, they were no longer free. They were bound to the land and could not leave it. Serfs. They were forced to work three or four days in each week on their lord's estate, without being paid for doing so. They could not give their daughters in marriage without their lord's leave. And beyond all this, they were in his power. He could punish them almost as he chose by fining them, or causing them to be flogged, and they could not get any redress. This was bad enough, but it was made worse by the fact that their lords were almost always foreigners. The Normans despised the English. They called them "dogs of Saxons", and treated them worse than dogs. They did not understand the English tongue, and paid no attention to what the English said or felt. William might pretend that he had, after all, only taken the place of Harold on the English throne, but de .v. aer. lbi .i. molin de xiii. sol 7 v. den. pui.

i. car. pasta ad pecuille. De .i. gungre. xoxii. den.
In totis ualent ual. vi. lib. Qdo recip similit. I. K. E.
viii. lib. hoc an ualent ual. in dno gred. s. panu.

TERRA S. PETRI WESTMONASTRI

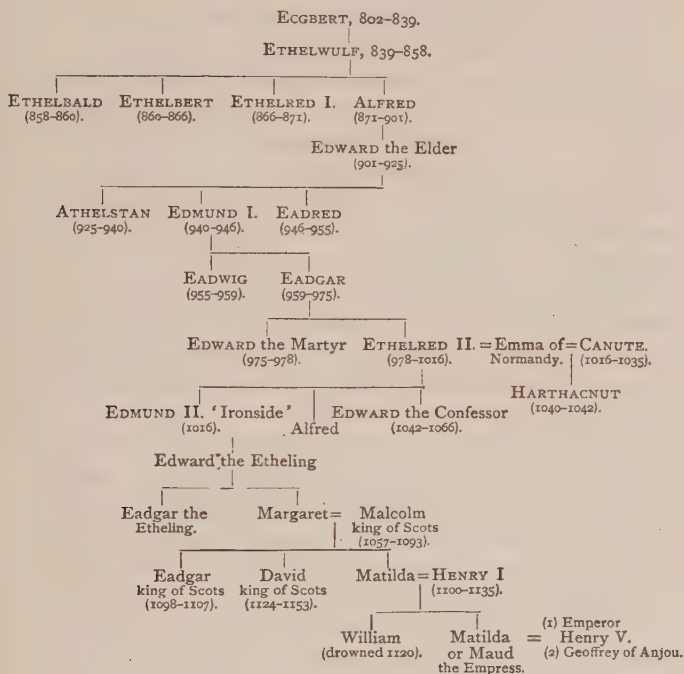

In villa ubi sedet ecclesia s. petri. tenet abb. eide lbi. xiii. hid. 7 dim. Tra. e. ad .xx. car. Ad dñum pan. re. hid. 7 i. uing. 7 ibi sust. ny. car. Villa hñc. vi.
car. in car. plus pot fieri. lbi. ix. uilli qsq. de .i. uing.
i. uilli de .i. hid. 7 ix. uilli qsq. de dim. uing. 7 i. cor de .v. ac. 7 xl. i. cor qratat p ann. xl. sol. p orat. sus.
pui. xi. car. pasta ad pecun. uille. Silva. c. porc.
xx. dom. mureu. abbi. d' uoz. hōum. qui redat viii. sol. p annu. In totis ualent ual. x. lib. Qdo recip. similit. I. K. E. xii. lib. Hoc an fuit 7 est in dno eccle. s. petri. westmonasterii.

In ead. uilla ten. Baniard. iii. hid. de abbe. Tra. e.
ad .ii. car. ibi sust. in dno 7 i. cor. Silva. c. porc.
pasta ad pecun. lbi. iii. arpenni uince. noue. plom.
In totis ualent ual. lx. sol. Qdo recip. x. sol. I. K. E.
vi. lib. In p. ual. ual. in eccle. s. petri.

In uilla de ten. abbi. s. petri. iii. hid. Tra. in.
car. Ad dñu. pan. iii. hid. dim. ibi. e. i. car. Villa
hñc. car. plus pot fieri. lbi. i. uill. de .i. uing. 7 v.
and. de .i. uing. 7 i. secus. Silva. c. porc. In totis ual. l. sol. Qdo recip. simit. I. K. E. c. sol.

In ead. uilla ten. Bani. parrel. sub abbe. i. hid. i. de qra. uillor. Tra. dim. car. ibi. est. In totis ual. in 7 ual. v. solid. Hoc an totu. simit. ual. ual. in dno eccle. s. petri. In Spelethorne. hñc.

THE HOUSE OF ECBERT.

THE ANGLO-NORMAN KINGS.

to the English he was indeed a conqueror, and a very hard conqueror as well.

The English might think their new position a bad one, and so indeed it was, but it might have been worse; we shall see that it became so when the strong hand of William and his sons was removed. The fact was that William ruled sternly, but he ruled all alike. He had been himself a feudal vassal before he became a feudal king. As Duke of Normandy he had been so strong in his own dominions that he could disobey his superior, the King of France, altogether. He was not willing to let his barons be as troublesome to him in England as he himself had been to the King of France. So he did three very wise things.

First: He had to give his barons much land, but he gave them it in scattered estates, not all together. Thus, if a baron wished to rebel against the king, he could not collect his forces in one place; and he had always jealous neighbours round him, who would keep a watch on what he did.

Secondly: William assembled all his tenants at Salisbury, and made them swear that they would obey the king first and their lords after; thus, if some lord wished to lead an army of his followers against the king, they would reply that their first duty was to obey the king.

And thirdly: William caused a great inquiry to be made, in which was set down all the land of England and who owned it, and what it was worth, so that he might know exactly what was due to him, and so that no one should be able to dispute over it. This inquiry was called the Domesday Survey, and it was so thorough that it even tells

William keeps a strong rule over the Barons.

Oath at Salisbury.

Domesday.

us how many villeins, and oxen, and sheep, and pigs, and mills, and fish-ponds there were on every estate in England. Many people thought it was unworthy of a king to inquire into things like these. One writer says "it is shame to be telling of, but he did not think it shame to be doing it". William, however, did not feel any shame in finding out all about his kingdom, in order to rule it well.

Yet with all the care he took William could not escape trouble. The English rebelled against him, and his Norman barons rebelled against him, and even his eldest son allied himself with the King of France against him. So William spent much of his time in fighting, which was after all what he loved best. For kings and barons in those days thought that the chief business of life was fighting. They despised those who stayed peaceably at home. At last, as William was watching his men burn the French town of Mantes, the horse on which he was riding was frightened by a blazing beam which fell near it, and reared. The king was thrown so hard against the pommel of his saddle that he suffered injuries of which he died a few days after.

William II., who is called Rufus—the Red—from his appearance, was a stern, hard man like his father, but far less just. He made his chancellor, Ranulf Flambard, take much money from his people, who got to hate him and his chancellor; and indeed the next king put Ranulf Flambard to death. William Rufus quarrelled also with the Church. It happened that he fell ill, and as he thought he was dying, he wished to try to atone for his sins; so he appointed Anselm to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, a see which he had been keeping vacant in order to get its revenues for him-

William's Troubles.

William II., 1087-1099.

Quarrel with Anselm.

self. Anselm was a good, gentle monk, and to those who brought the news of his appointment he said, "Will you couple me, a poor weak old sheep, to that fierce young bull the King of England?" Yet when he was once made archbishop, he soon showed that he would not submit to the king when the king was acting wrongly. He refused to pay the king for giving him the archbishopric, and rebuked him for his ill-deeds so sharply, that at last the king grew furious, and would have murdered him had he dared. So, having provoked his subjects and his barons and the Church by his severity and greediness after money, he was not regretted when he was killed by an arrow while hunting in the New Forest.

Henry I., who followed Rufus, was also a strong king, and not a merciful one. He kept his elder ^{Henry I.,} brother, Duke Robert of Normandy, in ^{1099-1135.} prison till he died. Once when he thought the men who coined his money were cheating him, he ordered the right hand of every one of them to be cut off. His barons rebelled against him, but he always overcame them. He kept such strict order in England that he was called the Lion of Justice. This alone would have made his English subjects like him, but they were still more pleased when he married Matilda of Scotland, who was descended from the old kings of Wessex. The Norman barons laughed at the king, who, they thought, was lowering himself by marrying a Saxon, one of the race they despised. They nicknamed the royal pair "Farmer Godric and his cummer Godgifu". But when a Norman king could marry a Saxon wife, it was clear that the two races would not remain separated much longer.

VI.—THE WORST EVILS OF FEUDALISM, AND THE RESTORATION OF ORDER.

In the last chapter we have seen England conquered, we might even say enslaved. It seems strange that after the first few years the English made no effort to get free. It was the Norman barons who made the rebellions. “But”, we are tempted to ask ourselves, “if the people hated a king as they hated William Rufus, why did not they combine with the barons to drive him out?” It would have been easy, of course; why was it not done? The answer is that Englishmen feared the Norman barons much more than they disliked the king. And they were right. Rufus might be bad, but a rule of the barons would be far worse.

Henry I.'s son had been drowned as he was trying to save his sister from off the wreck of the White Ship, which a drunken steersman had run on the Casquets. The king wished to secure the throne for his daughter Maud, and during his lifetime had made his barons swear to be faithful to her. But Maud had married Geoffrey of Anjou, who was hated as a foreigner. And, besides, no one then ever thought a woman to be a fit person to rule the kingdom. Thus, when Henry died the barons made Stephen king.

Stephen was a grandson of William the Conqueror, so he had some claim. He was also, the chronicler tells us, “a mild man”, so that it might be hoped that he would make a good king. But the throne was no place for a mild man at this time. What was wanted was a strong man who could keep order.

People want the King to be strong.

Maud.

Stephen, 1135-1154;
his Character.

Stephen gained his crown by the help of the barons and the Church; but soon he fell out with both, and to add to his troubles Maud landed with an army and laid claim to the kingdom. Civil War. Then began a long civil war, which went on up and down the country, now one side winning, now the other. At one time Maud's forces beat Stephen, and took him captive. So she for a time became ruler of England; but she was so haughty that her friends soon deserted her, and then the war began afresh. At another time, in the depth of winter, Stephen had Maud closely besieged in Oxford. She only escaped by dressing herself all in white, slipping out at night by a postern-gate, crossing the Thames on the ice, and fleeing across the snow. Then she gathered fresh forces and fought again.

The fact was that the war went on because the barons had no wish to stop it. When there was a dispute about the succession the king was Cruelties of the Barons. sure to be weak, and the barons could do as they pleased. Thus, in Stephen's reign England learnt what it really meant when the country was left to the mercy of feudal barons. The chronicler of the time describes what they did. "They built castles, and filled them with devils and evil men. They hanged up men by the feet, and smoked them with foul smoke. Some were hanged up by their thumbs, others by the head, and burning things were hung on to their feet. They put knotted strings about their heads, and writhed them till they went into the brain. They put men into prisons where adders and snakes and toads were crawling, and so tormented them. Some they put into a chest, short and narrow and not deep, that had sharp stones within, and forced men therein, so that they broke all their bones."

When Stephen brought over foreigners from abroad to fight for him, these behaved even worse, sacking, burning, spoiling wherever they went. "Men said that Christ and his saints slept." The poor were reduced to misery; many of them whose huts had been burnt died of cold and hunger in the fields. It is no wonder that the nineteen years of Stephen's reign were known as the "nineteen long winters".

Henry II., Maud's son, who succeeded Stephen, had no light task to restore order again. The first thing to be done was to tame the barons. In their castles they had been able to defy their enemies; Henry had their castles pulled down. Since they had held their own law-courts, it had often been impossible for the king's subjects to get justice; Henry limited these courts, and enforced the system of his grandfather, Henry I., who had sent his own travelling justices on circuit round the country to bring all under the king's law, in the same way as the justices go round now to the Assizes. Henry II. also began the use of a jury—that is to say, a body of men who were to say whether in their opinion a man was guilty of a charge brought against him. He drove out the cruel foreign soldiers who had tortured and plundered the people. He took back by force all the crown lands which the weak and foolish King Stephen had parted with. He prevented barons from coining their own money, and he put an end to private war; that is, to one baron attacking another with a private army on account of some private quarrel.

Henry II., 1154–1189,
restores order.

Henry was determined to be master in his own kingdom; and his people backed him up, because they saw that many masters, such as the barons, were far harder to serve than one king. But there was another body in England besides the barons ^{Power of} the Church, which was growing much too powerful. This was the Church. It was the Church, led by Stephen's brother, Henry of Winchester, which had put Stephen on the throne. When Stephen quarrelled with the Church, it was mainly by its influence that he had been dethroned, and Maud made Lady of England in his place. It was the Church, again, that had brought about the treaty which ended the war, and had given the throne to Henry II.

Besides this, there was another thing which displeased the king. William the Conqueror had given ^{Churchmen and} leave for Churchmen to be tried in the ^{the Law.} Church's own courts under the law of the Church. This meant that there were two systems of law in the country—the king's law and the Church's law, and they were very different. For example, a layman who committed a murder was hanged, but if a cleric committed a murder, all that could be done to him was to shut him up in a monastery, for the Church's courts had no power to give sentence of death; and men said that the Church courts often let off offenders very lightly. We might think that clerical murderers were rare, but the king's justices complained that since Henry's accession more than a hundred murderer's had escaped justice on the ground that they were clerics. The truth was, that the term cleric included not only parish priests and monks, but all who were engaged in any way in the service of the Church; and some of these led evil lives.

To bring the Church more under his power, Henry made his chancellor, Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury. Becket and the king had been great friends. We are told "they would play together like boys of one age", and Henry no doubt thought that a careless courtier, as Becket seemed, who wore gay clothes and hunted and jested, would be ready to do what his friend the king wished in Church matters. Becket.

The king was mistaken. As soon as Becket was made archbishop he changed his life altogether: he became solemn and pious. Instead of aiding the king he opposed him. His action seems cantankerous, but it was not so in reality. He feared that if clerics were put under the power of the ordinary law, they would lose much of their influence with the people. To do what Henry asked was in fact to weaken the power of the Church, and this as a churchman Becket honestly felt that he could not do. Accordingly when the king desired to have the clergy tried in the royal courts, Becket refused to agree. Henry flew into a rage, and drove Becket out of the kingdom.

For six years the quarrel continued. Then it was agreed that Becket might return if he would let bygones be bygones. But Becket did not keep to this; he began to interfere in what had been done in his absence. Henry was a very passionate man, who, when he was angry, would even fling himself down on the floor, and bite the rushes which were then used instead of carpets. On hearing what Becket had done, he cried out furiously, "Are there none of the cowards eating my bread who will rid me of this turbulent priest?" Four knights who heard him, set off for Canterbury, followed Becket into the cathedral, and hewed him down with their swords as he stood by the steps of the altar. Becket Murdered,
1170.

Everyone was horrified at such a wicked murder, and thought that Henry was responsible for it. Becket was regarded as a martyr and a saint, although most of his life had been more remarkable for ambition than holiness. Men went on pilgrimage to his tomb, since it was believed that miraculous cures were wrought there. Even Henry himself, proud king as he was, went to the tomb, and bared his back to be scourged by the monks as a sign that he repented. But the evil effects of his own passionate words and his followers' barbarous action did not end here. The king had to give up his attempt to bring the clergy under the ordinary law; and three hundred years passed before clergy were made liable to be tried for crimes, and punished for them in the same way as ordinary men.

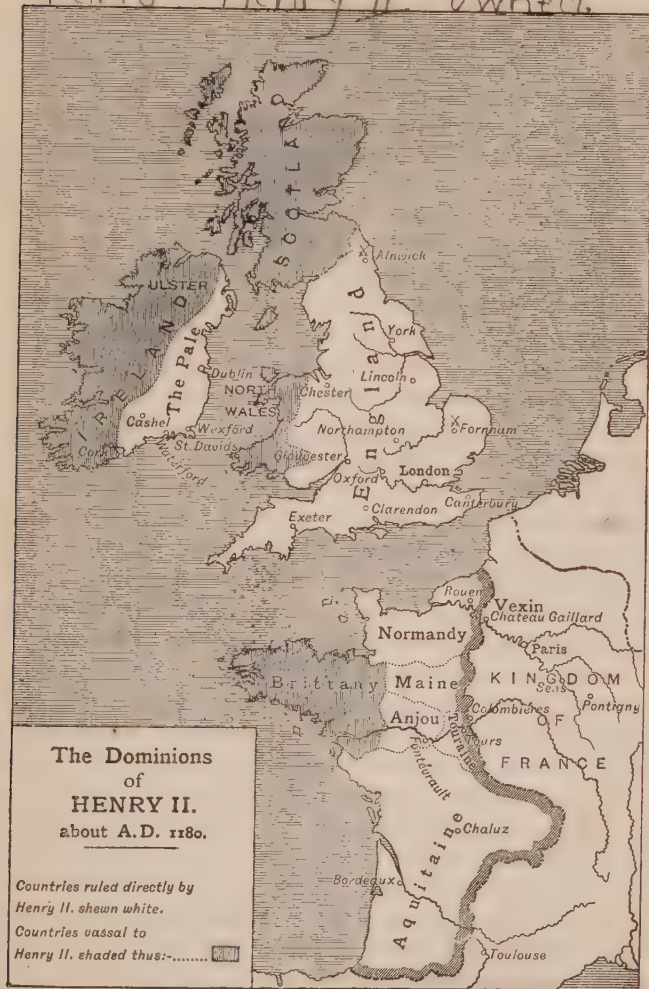

What we have to notice in the reign of Henry II. is the restoration of order in the country. The king strove to make all persons subject to the crown: to make the law supreme over all—powerful nobles and churchmen alike. In his first object he was successful, in the second he failed. But he failed, not because what he was attempting was unwise or unjust, but because he was put in the wrong by the foolish violence of those who thought they were helping him.

VII.—ENGLISH KINGS ABROAD. RICHARD THE CRUSADER

Henry II was a great restorer of law and order in England; we think of him as the strong king who saved his people from the harsh rule of feudal barons. But to men of his own day, that was very far from being the most

Henry II's
Foreign Dominions.

Parts Henry II. owned.

England Part of France The Pale in Ireland
Greater Part of France Channel to Pyrenees Scotland (overlaid)

remarkable thing about him. To them he was a great king, who owned wider dominions than ever a king of England had ruled before. The greater part of Wales owed him obedience; and one of Henry's barons named Strongbow had crossed into Ireland, and had made most of the Irish chieftains submit to him, so that Henry ruled over the Pale, the district round Dublin, and was in name king of the rest of Ireland too. Then he was successful in his wars against the Scots. His soldiers had captured the Scottish king, William the Lion, at Alnwick, and Henry did not allow him to go till he had done homage for his dominions; that was intended to show that the Scottish king held his kingdom as a grant from Henry. Thus Henry might claim to be lord also over Scotland. But beyond all this he ruled over more of France than the French king himself; he was master of the whole of the west coast of France, from the English Channel to the Pyrenees.

We noticed the marriage of Henry I. with a Saxon princess as a sign that Saxons and Normans were beginning to think of themselves, not as two separate races, but one people. In Henry II.'s reign the union became more complete. The two languages were mingling into one. From the mixture of Norman-French and the Saxon speech we get our own tongue. It is curious to think that, just at this time when the races were uniting to form England, our kings were growing more and more foreign, and more and more occupied with affairs outside England.

This seems all the more strange, because Henry's son, Richard I., is often taken as the type of a Briton. Richard I., His very name—the "Lion-heart"—makes 1189-1199. us think of the British Lion. His strength, his daring against odds, his rough good-nature, his love of adventure, all are marks of what we are proud of in Britons to-day. And yet this typical king is, in a way, more of a foreigner than any other king who has ruled over us. Out of his reign of ten years he only spent seven months in England. Yet, even if Englishmen did not see much of their king, he showed the world outside what an English king could do, and he made the name of our nation renowned among all the best warriors of Europe.

As soon as he came to the throne he made up his mind to join the great army of Crusaders that had set out to deliver the Holy City, Jerusalem, from the Saracens. To get money to pay his men he let off William the Lion from the duty of giving the homage which Henry II. had won. We shall see by and by how important this became. But for the present Richard was ready to sell anything. He even said in joke: "I would have sold London itself if I could have found a rich enough buyer".

When Richard reached the Holy Land he found the Crusaders doing very badly. They were trying to take Acre, but were making no headway with the siege. With Richard once on the spot all was changed. The Lion-heart soon showed that he deserved his name. He was always foremost in the attack, risking his life like a common soldier, but fighting with ten times the vigour. In three weeks Acre was taken. Duke Leopold of Austria planted his banner on the walls of it as if he had taken it himself. Richard was not the man to allow the glory to be stolen from him. He ordered the German banner to be cast into a ditch, and put his own in its place. But this act offended Leopold very much, and Richard had to pay for it later.

In the meantime, however, all the Crusaders followed him as the best leader, and he defeated the Saracen hosts in two great battles. Yet he never captured Jerusalem, because the French king went home with his men, and left Richard with too small an army to do anything. He got within sight of the Holy City, but he could not bear to look at it. "My eyes", he cried, "shall never behold it, if my arm may not reconquer it." With that he turned back.

Then, hearing that his brother John was plotting to take the throne of England from him, he started Richard's homewards. His ship, however, was Captivity. wrecked, and he was cast ashore in the domain of the very Duke of Austria whose flag he had insulted at Acre. Leopold kept him in prison for a time, and then sold him to the Emperor, Henry VI., and he too kept him captive. It was said that his prison was discovered by a minstrel named Blondel, who passed outside singing a song of Richard's own, and Richard answered by singing the song again.

After some delay the king was ransomed, and returned to England. There he found that John had been asserting that he was dead, and was trying to make himself king in his place. But everyone hated John, who was mean and cunning and cruel; and they were delighted to welcome Richard again. Richard was too good-natured to punish John. He despised him too much to be afraid of him.

Richard's death was much like his life. No sooner was he home than he began a war with the King of France, who was trying to get for himself the districts in France which belonged to the English crown. At last, while besieging the castle of Chaluz, Richard was struck by an arrow in the neck. The archer who shot it was brought before the dying king. Richard bade his officers send him away unharmed. It is sad to think that they did not obey the orders, but had the unlucky man flayed alive.

Richard was succeeded by his brother John, who was a very different kind of man. He could not keep his possessions in France, as Richard had done, by dint of hard fighting. He was too lazy and careless. Besides, he was so treacherous that all disliked him, and few cared to fight for him. He captured and put to death his boy nephew Arthur, a deed which made everyone shrink from him. So Philip the French king had little difficulty in reconquering all John's land in France except a small piece in the south, and thus John's nickname of "Lackland", given him by his father years before, doubly fitted him.

John's failure to keep his French possessions had great results in the history of our kingdom. So long as our kings were rulers over half of France as well as over England, they were inclined to pay little attention to English affairs; yet when these dominions oversea were lost, the king had to become an English king in reality as well as in name, and do what his subjects wanted. We shall see in the next chapter that the people of England made John, who was the worst king England has ever known, give them something which has been of more importance than anything else in the whole of our history.

VIII.—MAGNA CARTA; AND THE MAKINGS OF PARLIAMENT.

John, now forced to stay at home in England, soon succeeded in disgusting everyone by his behaviour. First of all he wanted to appoint a friend of his as Archbishop of Canterbury. But Pope Innocent III. thought John's friend unworthy John and the Pope. and chose Stephen Langton. John flew into a furious rage and swore he would never receive Langton. Innocent, however, would not give way either, and first he excommunicated John, and then put the realm under an interdict: that is to say, he forbade all services; the churches were closed; even the dead could not be buried in consecrated ground. Then, as John was still obstinate, the pope invited the King of France to send over an army to put him off the throne. At last John gave way. In sign that he submitted he even gave up his crown to Pandulf, the pope's legate, and received it back from him as a gift from the pope. Every Englishman was ashamed of a king who could demean himself in this way.

John continued to govern so badly that something had to be done. Accordingly Stephen Langton and the barons held a great meeting, to which they invited representatives from every shire to come and declare their grievances against the king, and consider what should be done to restrain him. John tried to collect forces, but he could do nothing. He had not to resist the barons alone; he had to meet the clergy, the knights, and the citizens of the towns as well.

Magna Carta, 1215. Indeed, everyone was united against him, and he had to give way. He met the barons at Runnimeade, and there he signed Magna Carta, the greatest charter of English liberties.

We must notice particularly two things to which the king bound himself.

(1) He was to take no tax except by common consent of the realm; and this consent was to be given in the Great Council, to which not only the greater

Photo. Mansell

From the official reproduction by permission of the Trustees of the British Museum barons and churchmen were to be summoned, but all those who held land from the king.

(2) No one was to be imprisoned or punished except after trial by his equals; and the charter adds, "to none will we sell, to none will we deny right or justice".

These safeguard two most important British rights: first, that the king may not take money, unless Parliament grants it to him; and secondly, that no man is to be punished without a trial, and that trial must be before a jury.

John signed the charter and promised to obey it; he gave his promise because at the time there was nothing else for him to do; and he gave it willingly, because from the first he had not the slightest intention of keeping it.

The Struggle
over the Charter.

He got the pope to say that he was not bound by his oath, one of those pieces of papal interference that made Englishmen dislike the pope. In less than a year he and the barons were again at war. The barons even invited the French king's son into England to fight against John, and they offered him the crown, but the struggle was stopped for the time by John's sudden death.

The new king, Henry III., was a boy of nine years old, so until he grew up the barons in the Great Council were able to govern as they wished. But when Henry became a man, he took the reins of power into his own hands. In many ways he was very different from John. Instead of being clever and cunning and treacherous, he was weak and foolish. But he was like him in ruling badly. He trusted much to foreign favourites, and he spent a great deal of money in giving large sums to the pope for things that could do no possible good to England. So by degrees men began to think that he too must be forced to govern better.

Henry III.,
1216-1272.

The leader of the party who wanted reform was Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, who had married the king's sister. Henry at first liked him. He had sent him to govern Guienne, the one province of France that still belonged to England. Simon was a good soldier and he had ruled it well, but Henry grew tired of him, and very meanly left Simon to pay from his own pocket the money which he had spent in the king's service.

Thus Earl Simon came home in disgust, and put himself at the head of the barons. They assembled in a Great Council, or, as we may now call it, a Parliament, for the word is first used in Henry III.'s reign, and arranged that all that the king did was to be overlooked by a committee of barons. The king promised to keep these "Provisions of Oxford" as they were called, but he was as false as John. He too got the pope to declare him quit of his oath, and so nothing was left for Simon and his party but to go to war. Each side gathered forces, and they met at Lewes. The king's army was bigger, but he lost the day because his son Edward pursued after some fugitives too far. When he returned Simon had won the battle. Both Henry and Edward were made captive.

Simon had no wish to seize the throne for himself; he only wanted to have the kingdom well governed, so he called a Parliament. It is this Parliament which gives Simon a title to be remembered for ever as one of the makers of the British constitution.

Simon's Parliament,
1265.

Hitherto the assembly which had helped the king to govern England had consisted of barons and churchmen. But Simon was not content with this; he summoned as well two knights from each shire, and two citizens from each city. Here for the first time we have the appearance in Parliament of the men who now compose the House of Commons. Simon may be called the founder of this House.

Simon governed well, but he could not prevent the barons who should have supported him from growing jealous of his power. So after two years the king's party raised a fresh army led by Prince Edward. Simon was surrounded at Evesham and killed, fighting bravely in the midst of his followers.

Battle of Evesham;
Death of Simon.

He had set a good example. He had summoned the first Parliament, which contained, as our parliaments do to-day, lords, county members, and borough members. But Simon was in a sense a rebel. It might be that no king would care to imitate what he had done; in this case nothing might have come of his experiment.

Curiously enough the man who followed Simon's example, and made his new scheme the regular rule for governing England, was the very one whom Simon regarded as his most bitter foe. The same Prince Edward, who had overthrown Simon at Evesham, adopted his measure when he became King Edward I. In 1295 he caused to be summoned a Parliament like Simon's Parliament, including knights of the shire and citizens from the towns; and by doing so he settled for ever the question of who should sit in Parliament. From this time onward no one would think that a Parliament was properly formed unless it included these representatives of the people. Thus 1272-1307.

Edward I.,

Model
Parliament.

Edward's Parliament of 1295 is always called the "Model Parliament", as it gave an example to all others to copy.

Of course Parliament of those days differed much from the Parliaments we know. It was one house, not two, for until Edward III.'s reign both lords and commons sat together. Now the commons are much the more powerful, but then the lords held the chief power. Now the monarch follows the wishes of Parliament in the choice of his ministers, then he did not consult its wishes. Now Parliament meets every year, then it met less often. But these are small differences. In nature Parliament of to-day is Powers of Parliament in the Fourteenth Century. as it was then; it refuses to allow the king to take taxes, or to make laws without its consent; and on occasions we may find it putting out very great power. It could dethrone kings who governed badly. For instance, it assisted to depose Edward I.'s own son, Edward II.; and, eighty years later, it put Richard II. off the throne, and made Henry IV. of Lancaster king in his place. We cannot, indeed, say that it ruled England all the time, or that it undertook all branches of government as it does now; but whenever there was need to control a king, or to get rid of him, men looked to Parliament to perform the duty.

IX.—THE BEGINNINGS OF SCOTLAND.

Since it is during the reign of Edward I. that the affairs of England and Scotland become seriously entangled, it is convenient at this point to turn back and see what the kingdom of Scotland was, and how it had been formed. We shall have to notice: (1) how the various kingdoms had come under one rule; (2) how the English language had spread in the country; and (3) in what way the kings of England had regarded it as a kingdom in some sense subject to them.

Four separate districts have gone to make up Scotland as it is now: the land of the Picts, which lay north of the Forth and Clyde, except ^{The Uniting} Argyleshire; the kingdom of the Scots ^{of Kingdoms.} (originally an Irish people) in Argyleshire; the kingdom called Strathclyde, which stretched originally from the Clyde to the Ribble, inhabited by Britons—of this, however, only the northern part came into Scottish hands; and last, the district called Lothian, inhabited by Angles. This included the east coast of Britain from the Forth to the Tees, but here, as in the case of Strathclyde, the southern part has fallen to England and not to Scotland.

Union began with Kenneth MacAlpin, King of the Scots, who made himself ruler over the Picts also. This joined the two Celtic peoples, and though Kenneth's power was certainly very ^{Kenneth MacAlpin,} slight in the far north, and only reached in ^{843.} the south to the Forth and Clyde, we have here the beginnings of Scotland, or Alban as it was called then. The next step on the part of the kings of Scotland was to spread their authority over the kingdom of Strathclyde. These Strathclyde Britons, were, however, also attacked ^{Strathclyde.} by the English in the south. Hence English and Scots came into conflict, each claiming to be rulers over Strathclyde. At last Edmund of Wessex found it wiser to make friends with the Scots than to wage war against them as well as against the Danes, so he made an alliance with Malcolm I. and gave up to him Strathclyde. It was not very clear that it had ever been his to give, for the English authority had never been firmly established there; but in any case the northern part of Strathclyde was joined to the Scottish dominions, and by 1018 the King of Scotland was also king there.

The last region to be added to the others was Lothian. Lothian was at first part of the Saxon kingdom of Northumbria. Then it passed Lothian. into Danish hands. When Alfred's grandsons again subdued the Danish powers in the north, it was doubtful to whom it should belong, for the King of Scotland had by this time seized Edinburgh and was laying claim to the country round it. Dunstan, who was minister to King Edgar, saw that it would be very hard for his master to hold a province so far north, and by his advice Edgar gave Lothian to Kenneth II. This was much like the gift of Strathclyde.

Lothian had once been under English power, and was English in speech. But it had passed from Saxon hands, and Edgar's "gift" was practically a surrender of what would be a great trouble to keep. Some fifty years later Lothian was again ceded to Malcolm II. by an earl of Northumbria after a great battle won by Malcolm at Carham in 1018, so that henceforward Lothian formed part of Scotland. It is worth note that this was the same year which saw the death of the last king of Strathclyde. Lothian was the last possession to be gained. It was a valuable addition to the kingdom, being a land of much agricultural wealth. It contained the city of Edinburgh. It was English in speech, as we have seen, and, from Lothian, English as the spoken language gradually spread over all the Lowlands. At that time Gaelic, British, and English were all in use in Scotland. How English came to dominate was largely due to the events of the reign of Malcolm III. (Canmore), the son of that King Duncan, who was killed by Macbeth. The story is familiar to us from Shakespeare's Macbeth play; though Macbeth, who had some claim to the throne, did not slay Duncan in his bed, as in the play, but in fair fight. The boy Malcolm fled from Macbeth to the English Court, where he spent fourteen years and learned to speak English. He married Margaret, sister of that Edgar Atheling whom the Witan chose as King of England after Harold's death at Hastings.

Margaret was a very remarkable woman. She was learned and pious, and her husband loved her much and followed her advice in many things. As was natural, she wished to see things done as she had seen them in England. Thus she persuaded the Scottish Church to fall in with the customs of the Roman Church, just as the English Church had done

Margaret. at the Synod of Whitby, four hundred years before. Many English clergy and many English officials were brought into Scotland, and Malcolm decided that English should be the official language of the kingdom. He also transferred the capital from Inverness, in the north, to Dunfermline, not far from the border of Lothian.

These changes were not liked by the older nobility, and after Malcolm's death Donald Bane, his brother, seized the throne, drove out the English-speaking officials, and tried to return to the old ways. For a time it seemed likely that Scotland might be divided into two—a Gaelic-speaking kingdom north of the Forth, and an English-speaking kingdom south of it; but at last Edgar, son of Malcolm Canmore, overcame

The Normans. Donald Bane. The army with which it was done was largely aided by Normans, who came from Rufus' dominions in search of adventures and estates. When the war was over, many of them were granted lands in Scotland. At a later time David I., Malcolm's son, introduced still more Norman lords to help maintain order, and so it comes that many of the great names in Scottish history bear Norman names. Lindsay, Ramsay, Wishart, Maxwell, are Norman. Indeed, Bruce himself bore a Norman name.

The marriage of Malcolm with Margaret had still other results. Malcolm, as a relative of the old kings of England, became an enemy of William the Conqueror. Hence we have a fresh reason for wars between England and Scotland. Indeed, it was while invading England that Malcolm was slain. His youngest son David patched up these quarrels David, 1124-1153. for a time, since it was his sister Matilda who married Henry I. But David, although King of Scotland, was also a Norman baron. He held two earldoms in England. He was the first man to take the oath to put Henry I.'s daughter, Matilda, on the throne. Consequently we find him taking part in the wars of Stephen's reign. Like many others, he could not resist the temptation of fishing for himself in troubled waters. And although he was defeated in the Battle of the Standard, Battle of the Standard, 1138. yet David managed to get Stephen to give him Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and Westmorland.

Henry II., however, looked on this just as he looked on the rest of Stephen's actions, and he did not intend to be bound by it. He made Malcolm IV., David's successor, restore the four counties, and when he captured William the Lion, compelled him to do homage for his kingdom. Richard I., as Treaty of Falaise, 1174. has been related, sold William his homage back again.

Thus the whole relation between the two countries was in a tangle. The English kings had tried to make out some claim to be lords over the kings of Scotland. They could point to gifts of territory and to acts of homage. On the other hand, the kings of Scotland could say that these gifts really implied nothing; that the homage was for English earldoms which they held, and not for their Scottish dominions; and that if any homage was due for Scotland itself, Richard's bargain had cancelled it. Yet so far there was no national enmity between the two. They did not glory in being different races. They fought indeed at times, now one side winning, and now the other. Yet even at the Battle of the Standard David of Scotland fought under the flag of the Dragon, the same sign as that which King Alfred had used, while a Robert Bruce, an ancestor of the Scottish patriot king, was in the English ranks. Scotland had not yet begun to think of England as a tyrant, nor did England look on Scotland as a rebel. This more bitter feeling was to spring from the doings of Edward I., to which we must next turn.

X.—AN EARLY GREAT BRITAIN AND ITS FAILURE.

We have seen Edward I. give England a Parliament in which all classes were represented—a Parliament that carried out the idea of a united English nation. But Edward was not content with this. He aimed at something much wider—a united British race.

His first effort was to join Wales to England. Piece by piece that country had been subdued, until Edward I. the dominions left to the Prince of Wales and Wales. included only the mountainous north-west corner of the country. Llewellyn, who was ruler there, refused to submit to the king. Edward led an army into Wales, and Llewellyn retired with his forces into the Snowdon range, feeling sure that the king could not follow him. Edward was much too wise to try. Instead of wasting his men among steep rocks, he blocked up all the passes, brought up a fleet to guard the coast, and starved Llewellyn out.

Llewellyn submitted, but he could not keep his word. Three years later he and his brother David raised a fresh rebellion. This failed also; the Prince himself was killed in single combat with one of Edward's followers; David was captured and put to death by the King as a traitor. The whole country came into Edward's hands, and he showed that he meant to keep it by bestowing on his son the title of the Prince of Wales, a title ever since given to the eldest son of English monarchs.

Edward now turned to Scotland, and Scottish affairs at this time gave him an excellent chance. Since the reign of John the two kingdoms had been fairly good friends. The last two Scottish kings, Alexander II. and Alexander III., had both married English princesses, and now, on the sudden death of Alexander III., his granddaughter Margaret, daughter of the King of Norway, was left heir to the throne. Edward's plan was to unite the two kingdoms by a marriage between this Maid of Norway and his own son Edward, Prince of Wales.

Edward and Scotland;
Union by Marriage.

No one can deny that the plan was good, always provided that it was to be wisely carried out. That the union of the two kingdoms has been of benefit to both is undoubted, and it is fair to think that it would have been as useful in 1286 as it proved to be in 1707; that it might well have been brought about by a royal marriage is obvious, for that, we know, is the very way in which it was brought about. People felt this at the time, for the Scottish Estates wrote to Edward, "we on our part heartily consent to the alliance, not doubting that you will agree to reasonable conditions". Edward was very reasonable. In the Treaty of Brigham, which arranged the matter, it was laid down that Scotland was to retain her laws, rights, and liberties, and to remain a separate kingdom. Edward did not, it is plain, look for an immediate or complete union. The union of the crowns would be a good beginning; the rest would follow in course of time. Again we may notice that this was what actually did happen much later.

Unluckily all depended on the Maid of Norway, and she fell ill on the voyage from her father's country to Scotland, and had to be landed in Orkney, where she soon died. Thus Edward's scheme failed, and what was far worse, Scotland was left without an heir to the throne.

Death of the Maid of Norway.

Edward would have acted most wisely if he had recognized that the great chance had gone, and if he had given up any idea of further interference in Scotland. But he saw that his plan was still as good, though it was no longer so easy to carry out. And he was encouraged to go on, since the Scottish barons begged him to act as umpire between the rival claimants to the throne.

Englishmen are too ready to look solely at Edward's object, and to forget his unwise and afterwards violent methods; Scots sometimes only see the latter, and accuse the king of deliberate treachery in all he did. Edward thought of the old English claims over Scotland in the narrow spirit of a lawyer. The Scots urged that these had been sold. But questions of this kind cannot be decided in legal documents or haggled over as if they were merchandise. Edward had determined to be lord over Britain, cost what it might. Scotland was equally determined to be free. Thus if we argue about oaths and rights we are wasting our breath. Edward may have broken oaths, but Robert Bruce did the same. English troops harried and burnt, but Scottish troops were no whit behind them. We must judge men in times like these by what they felt to be their duty to their country, as things came before them, and not by what they had sworn.

THE SCOTS SUCCESSION:

[The names of the three claimants are given in heavy type.]

When the Scottish barons met Edward at Norham there were ten candidates. Edward required them Choice of all to acknowledge him as lord paramount Balliol. of Scotland, which they did. A court of eighty Scots and twenty-four Englishmen tried the question. John Balliol and Robert Bruce had the best titles. Balliol was chosen and placed on the throne.

The reign of John Balliol is always regarded as a disgrace alike to king and nation, but it is hard to see that Balliol could have done better. Edward took care, before he set him on the throne, to make him swear to be obedient to him. But the Scottish nation had not the slightest intention of allowing him to be Balliol's obedient. So a quarrel at once broke out. Difficulties. A Scottish noble appealed to Edward against one of Balliol's decisions. Edward bade the Scottish king come to England to have the case decided there. It was clear that, if he refused, Edward would dethrone him; but if he obeyed, his own people would cast him out.

He refused to obey Edward, and Edward marched into Scotland with an army to subdue one whom he looked on as a rebel. He stormed Berwick, where the inhabitants were brutally massacred by his soldiers; he defeated a Scottish army at Dunbar, the Scots rushing down to attack what they thought to be a retreating force and being themselves routed, and soon overran the whole country. Balliol was deposed, and Edward took Scotland for himself, setting up Warenne, Cressingham, and Ormesby as regents. Scotland as an independent kingdom seemed to have come to an end.

XI.—THE STORY OF SCOTTISH INDEPENDENCE. WALLACE AND ROBERT BRUCE.

No one had liked Balliol from the first. Yet when a king of England showed that he meant to conquer Scotland and make it part of his kingdom by force, the whole of Scotland determined to resist. Hitherto Edward had had, in the main, to deal with the Scottish barons; they, as we have seen, were largely Norman in blood. Now he had to encounter something quite different, the Scottish people in arms against him.

The hero round whom a national spirit gathered was Sir William Wallace. Wallace had engaged in a street brawl in the town of Lanark, had slain an English sheriff and had taken to the hills. He was joined by all to whom the English invaders were hateful, and soon found himself at the head of a considerable force. He advanced to meet the English near Cambuskenneth. Cressingham, who despised his enemy, tried to cross the Forth over a bridge so narrow that only two horsemen could ride abreast on it. Wallace attacked him when a third of his force Wallace.

Battle of Cambuskenneth or Stirling, 1297.

was across, and routed him. Cressingham himself fell in the battle and his army scattered. All the fortresses fell, and the invaders were driven from Scotland. Wallace followed up this blow by leading an army into England and raiding the northern counties.

Edward was not the man to put up with this. He made up his mind to go to Scotland in person and crush Wallace. This did not seem easy. Wallace retreated, and Edward could not hear where the Scottish army lay. In the meanwhile he found it hard to feed his men, since the country had been laid waste around him. At last Wallace's situation was betrayed to him by two discontented Scottish nobles. Edward instantly set out by night, and came on Wallace near Falkirk before he had time to retire. Two charges of the English knights were beaten off by the Scottish pikemen, but then Edward brought his archers into action. The Scots were shot down without being able to reply, and at last a third and final charge broke the Scottish array. It is said that at least 15,000 Scots fell.

For seven years Edward strove to complete his conquest. He led army after army into the country, but so long as Wallace was at large the resistance went on. At length, in 1305, Wallace was betrayed by some of his followers to Sir John Menteith, who was acting as Edward's sheriff in Dumbarton, and by him handed over to Edward. Menteith is generally called a traitor for this, and as a Scot he acted treacherously to his country. Still, he had taken Edward's side, was Edward's officer, and in capturing Wallace was so far doing his duty to the master he had chosen. Wallace was taken to England, and tried as a traitor

Battle of
Falkirk, 1298.
Capture and Death of Wallace.

CORONATION CHAIR, IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY
With the "Stone of Destiny" taken from Scotland by Edward I to King Edward. He denied that he could be a traitor, since he had never sworn to obey Edward. But the king had him condemned. He was hanged, and his body, cut into four pieces, was fixed on the gates of Newcastle, Berwick, Stirling, and Perth. Edward meant to warn the Scots against further risings, but he made a great mistake. His cruel treatment of Wallace only made the Scots hate him the more.

With Wallace dead, Edward might think that Scotland was subdued. In a year the Scots had found a fresh leader. Robert Bruce, the grand-son of him who had been Balliol's rival, Robert Bruce. started up in Wallace's place. Edward was thunder-struck to learn that Bruce had murdered Comyn, one of his regents, in the church at Dumfries, and had been crowned at Scone. 1306

Although Bruce was a king, he was a king without a kingdom or an army. His few followers were scattered in the battle of Methven, and Bruce had to flee to the Highlands. Even some of his countrymen sought his blood; the Lord of Lorn, a relation of Comyn, desired to avenge his murdered kinsman. Bruce, however, had great personal strength and good friends, chief of whom was Sir James Douglas, "the good Lord James". Still, so desperate were his fortunes that he had for a time to take refuge in the lonely island of Rathlin, near the Irish coast.

After a while he landed in Ayrshire, and fought numbers of small battles with the English forces. Often he was nearly captured or killed, Bruce returns to Scotland. but this continuous warfare taught his men to become good soldiers. One stroke of fortune befell Bruce, and that was the death of his old enemy, Edward I., while marching northward to invade Scotland again. Even had Edward lived he could not have won in the end. He might have beaten Bruce, but he could not have conquered the Scottish nation and kept it down by force of arms. His plans, good as they were, had completely failed. He had wished to unite Scotland and England; all he had done was to divide them more deeply than they had ever been divided before.

When the old "Hammer of the Scots" was gone, Bruce soon found his son, Edward II., to be a feeble foe. His armies were badly led, his plans badly made. One by one the castles in Scotland were wrested from English hands. Douglas surprised Roxburgh; Randolph captured Edinburgh by sending a daring body of men to climb the castle rock; Binning seized Linlithgow by driving a wagon of hay under the gateway, so that the portcullis could not be let down. By degrees Bruce became master of the whole land. In 1310 the Scottish Estates met at Dundee, and declared that Bruce was their lawful sovereign; they would fight for him and none other.

Stirling Castle alone held out. In 1314 Edward II. led a huge army northward to relieve it. Bruce with far smaller forces determined to give battle.

Battle of Bannockburn,
1314. It was daring, for the English were two to one, but Bruce's men were now fine soldiers, confident and experienced. The armies met at Bannockburn. Bruce had guarded his flank by digging pitfalls to check the charge of the English knights, while the marshy ground by the burn side also served to protect him. Edward II. threw away every advantage that his numbers gave him. He allowed his archers to be driven off by a charge of Scottish horse; he sent his knights to charge full on the Scottish pikes. He was fighting against men who were determined to conquer or die; men who were burning to set their country free, who were fighting to protect their homes, their wives and children, and to pay back the terrible wrongs they had suffered. The Scottish pikemen stood like rocks in a storm, casting back the charges of English knights time after time; now seeming overwhelmed, then appearing again unbroken. The English attack was beginning to waver, and the Scots themselves advanced crying, "On them, on them; they fail", when a body of Scottish camp-followers were seen pouring down from the Gillies Hill. They seemed to be a fresh Scottish force, arriving to support their comrades. The English broke and fled in terrible confusion; in the rout 30,000 men were killed.

Bannockburn decided the question once for all. England could not conquer Scotland. But Edward II., too feeble to conduct a war properly, was too obstinate to yield. Through his reign the war went on. It was now the turn of the Scots. Bruce led his armies over the border, and pillaged the north of England. Edward could do little to check him. Indeed he could not keep his own barons in order; it was vain for him to hope to subdue the Scots.

Tired of him and his favourites, the English barons rebelled; Parliament declared him deposed, and Edward III. was put on the throne. He began to make war against the Scots with vigour, but he could gain no advantage over the invading Scottish army. He encamped opposite it, but its position was so strong that he dared not attack, and he himself was nearly slain. James Douglas led a night raid into the English camp, and actually got as far as the royal tent before he was driven back. Then the Scots retreated in the night, leaving their camp-fires burning, so that the English did not perceive their going, and Edward was left with no enemy to fight.

He saw that it was useless to go on. In 1328 peace was made between the two nations, in which Bruce was recognized as lawful King of Scotland, and the King of England gave up all his claims. Scotland had triumphed.

Robert Bruce's reign ended in 1329. For Scotland it was a memorable reign. Before its close he had obtained a mastery over all his foes at home and abroad. He had established the alliance between Scotland and France which was to lead to so much.

He had freed Scotland from the foreign invader. He had united it as it had never been united before. All alike were ready to obey him. The barons, many of whom were Norman in descent and hitherto half-Norman in feeling, had become good Scotsmen and good patriots. In the fire of national trouble there had been welded a nation, firm, self-reliant, confident, proud of its race and of its king.

XII.—THE HUNDRED YEARS' WAR. THE WORTH OF THE ENGLISH ARCHER.

The Hundred Years' War is the name given to the long struggle between England and France, from 1338 to 1453—roughly speaking, a hundred years. War indeed did not go on all the time. There were truces now and again. But, speaking generally, for a hundred years England and France were enemies. In following this long period of history, which covers the reigns of five English kings, we shall find it convenient to fix in our minds some landmarks.

The war may be divided into two periods of great success and two periods of failure. The first period of success lies in the early part of Edward III.'s reign. We have the battles of Cressy and Poitiers, and the Treaty of Bretigny, in which the French king admits the English claim to the south-west of France; this is followed by a time of failure in the latter part of Edward III.'s reign and that of Richard II. The second period of success begins with Henry V. He outdoes the glory of Cressy and Poitiers by his victory of Agincourt; he marries the King of France's daughter and is called his heir; his infant son, Henry VI., is crowned King of France. But

Divisions in the Hundred Years' War.

then comes the second period of failure. By degrees all was lost that had been won, till in 1453 nothing was left to England save Calais.

Edward III. and Henry V. are both victorious in their battles; they both claim the title of King of France, though neither had any right to it; they both rule large possessions in France; in both cases these dominions are at last recaptured by the French.

Our first task is to see why the English win the great battles. It seems very strange, that at Cressy the French were four to one, at Poitiers seven to one, at Agincourt five to one, and yet they were hopelessly beaten in all three battles. Let us look more closely at the story of these battles.

Cressy was fought in 1346. Edward III. was retreating towards Calais after an unsuccessful march on Paris. He was caught up by the French, who numbered 70,000 men to his 20,000. He drew up his army with the archers in front and his knights, dismounted, behind. The shower of arrows first destroyed the crossbowmen in the French force; no wonder, for the English archer could shoot six arrows to his opponent's one. We are told "they shot so fast and so thick that it seemed as if it were snowing". Then the French knights charged, but men and horse went down under the English arrows so fast that only a very few reached the English line, and they were easily beaten off. And when this had gone on for most of the day the remains of the French army fled. Edward III., who commanded the English reserve, had not struck a blow.

Cressy, 1346.

The hero of Poitiers was the Black Prince. He had been raiding in France, but found his return cut off by 40,000 French soldiers under King John. He had only 7000 men with him, 3000 of whom were archers. He drew up his small force behind a hedge and awaited the French onset. This time most of the French attacked on foot, but met no better success than at Cressy. The archers kept up a steady discharge; the French ranks were broken ere they reached the hedge; they came on bravely, but the English slew each man as he came through a gap. One division of the French army retreating threw the next into disorder. Meanwhile the arrows poured down like hail, and the English bowmen, who drew their bowstrings to their ears, sent their shafts with force enough to pierce any but the best armour. At the end of the day the Black Prince led his own men to charge the last division of the French army in front, while a small body of horse was sent round to take it in the rear. The French gave way in all directions; the French king himself was captured; and the English, with a loss of 300 men, found they had killed and captured almost as many Frenchmen as there were men in their own army.

The story of Agincourt begins like that of Cressy. Henry V. was making for Calais. The French barred his way. 6000 Englishmen, worn out by long marches, had to face 30,000 of the best knights in France. Henry placed some of his archers in front, and sent others to line the woods which covered the flanks of his small force on either side. The French had to advance across a muddy ploughland a mile in length. So heavy were the men in armour, and so sticky the mud, that as a body they never reached the English at all. A few managed to crawl up, but the great mass stuck, a splendid mark for the English archers. When it had been well riddled, the English charged. Being lightly armed and without armour, they could move freely where the enemy could not; and thus first the French vanguard, and then the main line, were overthrown and butchered, the dead actually lying two or three deep. The third division of the French army fled, though it alone far outnumbered Henry's entire force, being too terrified to stand an attack.

One fact stands out in all the battles. The English archers decided them. Not only could they shoot The English Archers. farther and faster than any crossbowmen, or French archers, but when properly backed they could stop heavy cavalry. The day of the knights in armour was over. Their charges, hitherto thought irresistible, could be broken by archers and steady infantry. The best missile weapons won. The same fact has been shown over and over again in the history of war. Just as the longbow beat the crossbow, so the musket has beaten the bow, the rifle has replaced the smooth bore, the breech-loader has triumphed over the muzzle-loader, and the magazine-rifle and the machine-gun now hold the field, with increased range and rapidity of fire.

Yet although England could beat the French in Reasons for English Failure. pitched battles, they were not numerous enough to hold the country. They could overrun it; the Duke of Lancaster could march across the south of France, and none dared meet him in battle. Yet when the French remained in their walled towns they were safe. In days when artillery was scarcely used, and was very cumbrous and short in range, sieges were long affairs, needing many men and costing many lives. Thus when the French had learned wisdom; when they risked no pitched battles, but fought behind walls; when they kept up a continual warfare on small parties, the English power drooped. Bit by bit Bertrand du Guesclin regained all that had been lost. When Edward III. died the English possessions had dwindled down to Bordeaux, a strip of Gascony, and Calais; in Richard II.'s reign the French even invaded England. They plundered the Isle of Wight, and for a time a French force was encamped in Sussex.

Henry V., we have seen, was more startlingly successful than Edward III. at his best, for his son was proclaimed King of France at Paris. Still, he had a much easier task. The French king, Charles VI., was little better than a madman. France itself was not united; it was divided up into two great parties, the Burgundians, headed by their duke, and the Orleanists or Armagnacs. So The Alliance of England and Burgundy. fierce were these factions against each other that they even descended to murder. First a Duke of Orleans, and then a Duke of Burgundy was treacherously slain by the other side. In the end the Burgundians, sooner than see the Armagnacs triumph, allied themselves with Henry V. Thus it is not England alone fighting against France. It is England, in alliance with one half of France, fighting against the other.

Henry V.'s success, then, depended much on the Burgundian alliance. He was strong because France was divided. But this could not last. Nothing, in fact, unites a country so speedily as foreign invasion. We have seen this already in Scotland. We may observe it again in France. By degrees Burgundians and Armagnacs came to see that they were both Frenchmen, to whom England was a deadly foe.

The task of rousing the French spirit fell to Jeanne Darc, commonly called in England Joan of Arc. She was a simple peasant girl, who believed that she was sent by heaven to drive the English from France. Dressed as a soldier, she led the French soldiers to the attack. She entered Orleans, and drove off the English who were besieging it; then she won battle after battle. The English declared that they could not beat her. This was true, for she was backed by France growing united again. Even after Joan had been taken prisoner, and cruelly burned as a witch by the English, things went from bad to worse with our armies. Soon the Burgundians abandoned the English alliance, and then English power in France vanished for the last time. It is interesting for our purpose to notice that the first in the long series of English defeats, that of Beaugé, was mainly won for the French by a body of Scots. Here was one result of that alliance which lasted so long between England's two enemies. Pope Martin V., hearing of the share of the Scots in the victory, observed, "Truly the Scots are a cure for the English".

The Hundred Years' War practically brings to an end English efforts to gain territory on the Continent. That object abandoned, we shall see England turn to a new plan, namely, that of spreading her power at sea and in the New World. Before, however, she had the opportunity to do this, she had to pass through a period of trouble at home, which was something like the trouble that she had profited by in France. She was torn to pieces by bloody wars for the crown. Fortunately no foreign invader came to England to make matters worse, as Henry V. had done for France.

Richard II

XIII.—THE BLACK DEATH AND THE SERFS.

We have seen that the Norman Conquest left the class who cultivated the land in the position of serfs. They were bound to the land, and had to give their lord so many days' work each week, and certain extra days' work at the busy seasons of hay-making, harvest, and ploughing. As time went on, however, many of the serfs had come to an arrangement with their lords to pay money instead of service; Commutation for example, if a man's labour was reckoned of Service. at a penny a day he would pay threepence a week if he had owed three days' work, and further pennies for extra days. The plan was convenient for both parties: the serf got more time to work on his own plot of land; the lord got money with which he could hire labourers and was saved the trouble of continually striving to compel unwilling or lazy serfs to perform their services.

This plan of "commuting" services for money was spreading gradually over the country, but it was not complete, when it was interrupted by a disaster. This was the Black Death, a fearful plague which The Black ravaged our island from 1347 to 1350. Death. At least one-third of the whole population perished. It is literally true that often the living could scarce bury the dead; for example, more than one case occurred where all the inhabitants of a monastery were cut off, or every member of a large family died, so that there was none left to inherit the land.

We have especially to look at the effects of this in the rural districts. It is plain that labour would become very hard to get; and, further, Rise in Wages. since at the height of the plague men were so terrified that they left the harvest to rot ungathered in the fields, corn became scarce. This caused a rise in prices; and as prices rose, and labourers were few, we should be prepared to find a rise in wages also. In fact, this is what happened. Wages rose sharply.

This all hit the land-owners hard. To begin with, many of their tenants were dead, some without leaving Difficulties of the Lords. heirs; and so they lost the payments for commuted service which these had owed. Further, what had paid for a day's labour in the days before the Black Death would no longer pay it after the rise in wages. It was a common complaint that whereas a woman's labour had cost $\frac{1}{2}d.$ a day, now it cost $2d.$ or $3d.$ Hence ruin stared the lord in the face if he had to receive at the old rates and pay at the new ones.

Something clearly had to be done; and as the land-owners were strong in Parliament, we shall find their policy in tracing what Parliament did. The first idea was to check this rise in wages, which seemed to them ruinous. No injustice was intended, because Parliament meant to check the rise in prices also; if prices remained the same, it was argued, there was no need for wages to rise. It seems strange to us to think of Parliament meddling in such matters, except as in the time of the Great War, but there was nothing strange to men of the day. Every trade had its craft gild, which fixed the price at which its wares should be sold. Parliament was only attempting to do for the country what the craft gilds did in the towns.

The task, however, was too big. Parliament made a series of laws called the Statutes of Labourers, by which all labourers were ordered to take the Statutes of Labourers. old rate of wages, under pain of imprisonment, branding with a hot iron, slavery, and even death. But even these ferocious penalties could not make men obey the laws. The rise in prices went on: men could not live on the old wages; and yet lords could not afford to see their estates uncultivated. Thus many lords were tempted to break the very laws that were intended to protect them, by offering the higher wages which Parliament had prohibited.

The policy of trying to put the clock back failed; it was bound to fail. Yet a party of the land-owners, untaught by their first failure, tried to go Revival of Serfdom. still farther back. Wages, they felt, were at the root of the trouble; but there had been a time when no wages were paid or needed, when all paid services, and the land was cultivated by serfs. Why not revive this? It seemed easy; all that was needed was to refuse the commutation payments, and make the serfs pay services once more.

This policy was worse than the other. Men who have partly gained freedom will not consent to lose what they have won. Soon all the pea- Peasant Revolt. sants were infuriated with the lords. A poll-tax which pressed far more on the poor than it did on the rich caused their smouldering discontent to break into flame. In 1381 risings broke out in East Anglia and in all the counties near London.

The Kentish peasants, with Wat Tyler as leader, reached London. Richard II. met them boldly at Smithfield. There was need of courage, for the city was in the hands of the mob, and the day before, rioters, pouring into the Tower of London, had murdered the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Treasurer, who had proposed the hateful poll-tax. As Wat Tyler approached, the Mayor of London, thinking he meant to insult and perhaps attack the king, cut him down. The mob were bending their bows to fire on the royal party, when Richard rode forward and cried to them, "I will be your leader", and by fair words and promises got them to disperse quietly. These promises were not kept. The rioters, by burning manor-houses to destroy the records of the serfdom, and hanging lawyers as being the persons who made these deeds, and generally acting in a brutal way, made it impossible to treat them mildly. So the king employed force, and put down the Peasant Revolt with great severity.

Thus injustice had led to violence, as it often does, and neither party had gained. In few cases were the lords able to force their serfs to pay services again; on the other hand, many rioters were hanged, and the rebels did not get the abolition of serfdom which they had demanded.

Since labour could not be obtained at the old rates, nor services re-exacted without danger of violence and murder, it was necessary to pay the new rates, or to do with less labour. Some lords granted land on lease to tenants for a rent, giving them stock as well as land. Thus the tenant had to find the labour; the lord was free of the difficulty. Here we have the beginnings of the modern farmer, a person who stands between the labourer and the land-owner. Others, however, met the difficulty in another way. There was a great demand at the time for wool, and English wool Sheep-farming. was then the best that could be had. So, many lords started sheep-farming instead of arable farming. It paid better, because less labour was needed. Many labourers were required for a large arable farm; but when it was laid down in grass one or two shepherds could tend all the sheep on it.

JOHN WYCLIF

From a painting at King's College, Cambridge

Thus sheep-farming led to many men being out of employment; and as under the old system the serfs' small patches of land were often mixed Depopulation. up with the wide farms of the land-owner, now the latter came to wish to evict the serfs and take their land for sheep-farms. He enclosed also the waste or common land on which the serfs had pastured their cattle, and this, too, made it hard for the serfs to keep their holdings. Thus the land-owners who had at first struggled to keep their serfs, ended by trying to drive them off altogether. No doubt great misery was often caused by this depopulation. Something of the same kind has been seen in more recent times in the Highlands of Scotland, where crofters have been turned out to give place to sheep-farms and deer-forests. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries Parliament tried to stop this process of enclosure for sheep-farms, but without much result.

Thus in the end the effects of the Black Death caused serfdom to disappear. By the time of Elizabeth it was at an end. But it was not that the peasants obtained freedom by their revolt. Upon the whole, the revolt only made their chains tighter. Yet by degrees the labour of serfs came to be no longer required; and lords granted freedom easily, since serfdom was no longer worth keeping.

XIV.—WYCLIF AND THE LOLLARDS.

More than a hundred years before Martin Luther began his dispute with the Roman Church which ended in the Reformation, England had seen a churchman start on a very similar career. The story of John Wyclif and his followers, the Lollards, shows clearly that England was not at all satisfied with the authority of the pope long before the time came when the nation broke away from the Roman authority, and the Church of England became National and Protestant.

The interference of the pope in English affairs, even when this interference was only in affairs of Dislike of the Pope. the Church, had always been disliked. In Edward III.'s reign this feeling of dislike became very strong. Men saw a great deal of money being sent to Rome as taxes, and they did not think it right that they should pay it; they saw, too, a great many foreigners who were appointed by the pope holding rich livings, deaneries, and high posts in the Church, and they would have preferred that Englishmen should have these posts. They saw a few churchmen, each holding many livings, and perhaps never going near some of them, and they contrasted the fine clothes and crowds of servants of these men with the poverty of the parish priests. It seemed to them that these rich churchmen neglected their duty, and thought more of the good things of this world than it was right for them to do. "God", they said, "gave His people to be pastured, not to be shaven and shorn." And so the idea got about that some change and reform was needed. We must not think that all, or even the greater part of the churchmen in England were negligent or careless; there were many then, as there have always been, bent on doing their duty to the utmost. Unfortunately it was not for the most part these men who were placed in high positions.

Besides the ordinary clergy there was in England a large number of friars. These were quite different from the monks who stayed in their monasteries, often leading idle lives there. The Friars. The friars, who mostly belonged either to the Dominican or the Franciscan order, went among the people. St. Dominic, who founded the first order, had sent his friars to preach and to convert those who believed wrongly or were careless about religion. St. Francis bade his order show by the example of a pure and simple life, and charitable acts, what the followers of Christ should do. Both Black and Grey Friars, as they were called from their dresses, were to copy the poverty of our Lord, and to live and teach amongst the poor. They were not allowed at first to have any property at all.

These orders began well, and when they first came to England, in the reign of Henry III., they did a great deal of good. But unfortunately they did not keep to their simplicity and their vows of poverty. They grew rich, and they grew learned; and they deserted the habitations of the poor, going instead among the rich, or to the universities, where they became great scholars and teachers, but not teachers of what they had first been sent to teach, namely, the simple message of Christ. And those who remained scattered over the country were disliked because they were obedient only to the pope; they were not obliged to obey English bishops, and they often interfered with the parish priests.

All these things helped to rouse a feeling of hostility to the clergy, and especially to the pope; and to make things worse, the popes themselves at this time had fallen on evil days. First of all, they had been unwise enough to leave Rome (1309) and live at Avignon in France, and so they fell much into the power of the kings of France. Englishmen at this time hated France, with whom they were carrying on a prolonged war, and were consequently disposed to be prejudiced against what they regarded as French popes. Then in 1378 began the Great Schism, when there was one pope at Rome and another at Avignon, each claiming to be Christ's vicar on earth. This division went on for forty years, and while some people obeyed the popes at Avignon and others the popes at Rome, many were inclined to reject both. So that altogether the authority of the popes became for the time much less convincing than it had been.

John Wyclif, who became the leader of the attack on the faults of the clergy, was a Yorkshireman who had gone to Oxford, where he had become master of Balliol College. Being a scholar, he looked at matters from a historical point of view. The faults of the Church, he said, came in the main from its pursuit of wealth and power on earth: if it had remained true to the poverty and simplicity of the apostles none of the abuses would have occurred. Thus he found nothing in the Bible to justify the payments made to the pope, called annates and first-fruits, or to excuse the holding of more than one benefice at once (pluralities), or to defend the easy and careless lives which were led alike by many churchmen and many friars. Wyclif was at first helped by John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who wished to drive the clerics out from the council of King Edward III. Thus when Wyclif was summoned to St. Paul's to be tried for what he had written, the duke stood beside him to defend him; when Courtenay, Bishop of London, declared that Wyclif was little better than a heretic, the duke threatened to drag Courtenay from the church by the hair of his head. A riot began; the citizens of London rushed in to defend their bishop; and Wyclif nearly lost his life. 1377.

Brawling and abuse was not the way to mend matters. Wyclif himself took no part in it. His next steps were more practical. He founded an order of poor preachers, "the Simple Priests", to spread his ideas among the people. He also directly appealed to the people himself by his tracts, which he wrote, not in Latin, the language hitherto used for all religious discussion, but in homely, plain, forcible English, which all could understand. We shall find Luther also discarding the priestly Latin in favour of his native German when he too begins his quarrel with the Catholic Church. And finally, Wyclif also anticipated Luther's work by translating the Bible from the Latin into English, so that it should no longer be the property of scholars, but open to all to read for themselves, or aloud to their friends who were too ignorant to read.

For a time Wyclif's followers, the Lollards, increased fast in numbers. It was said that if you saw five men talking together, three were Lollards. But in the later years of Richard II. the Church began to take vigorous measures to root out their heresy. And when Henry IV., who owed his position on the throne partly to the support of the Church, became king, the persecution grew fierce.

Thus the beginning of Henry's reign is marked by a statute "for the burning of Heretics", and directly after a Lollard named William Sawtre was sent 1401. to the stake. In Henry V.'s reign the Lollards were still numerous enough to threaten a rebellion. They were protected and encouraged by Sir John Lollard Oldcastle, a brave soldier who had fought Rising. well in Henry IV.'s wars against the Welsh. He was arrested and sentenced to be burnt, but he escaped. A plot was formed for a great mass of Lollards to meet in St. Giles's fields, and to seize the king. The plot was discovered, and the king, by closing the gates of London and sending a body of horse to the meeting-place, prevented an outbreak. Oldcastle was at last recaptured and burned as a heretic. After this we hear little more of the Lollards, although in a few villages Lollardy lingered on till the time of the Reformation.

The movement was on the whole a failure, because the Lollards had nothing definite to propose. They were united in complaining about the wealth and luxury of great churchmen, but in little else. Some followed Wyclif's later opinions, and became actually heretics; that is to say, they denied some of the teachings of the Church, and wanted a reform in doctrine. But the people at large had not the least wish for this; they regarded it as going much too far. In two points, however, Wyclif's life is memorable. He gave us our first Bible in English, and he also taught the right of all, clergy and laity alike, to form their ideas of conduct on what they found in the Bible, without being obliged to follow blindly what they were told to believe.

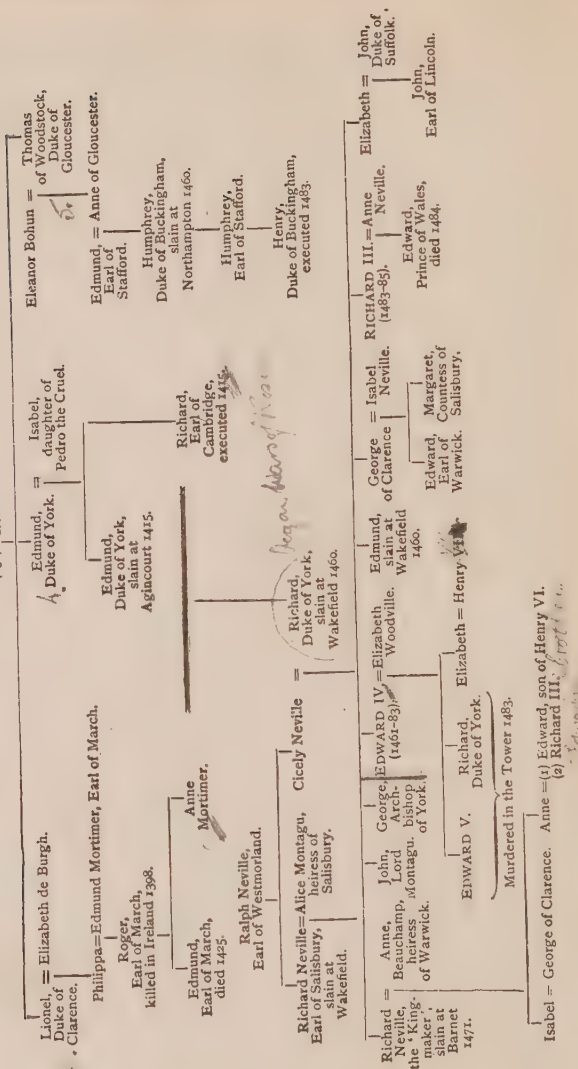

XV.—THE WARS OF THE ROSES.

We have already seen the evils of a dispute over the rightful heir to the throne in Scotland, and in France. We have now to observe them in England. Edward III.'s eldest son, the Black Prince, died before his father, but he left a son who became Richard II. Richard II. had no children; he made many enemies, and his cousin, Henry of Lancaster, deposed him and became king as Henry IV. Unfortunately there were other cousins descended also from Edward III., and representing the lines of Clarence and York. Since Clarence was of an older line than Lancaster, there was always a doubt if the house of Lancaster had the best right to the crown. And at last a York married a Clarence, and the child of that marriage, Richard of York, began the Wars of the Roses to turn the Lancaster king, Henry VI., off the throne.

Disputes about the Succession;
Lancaster and York.

Had Henry VI. been as strong a king as his father Henry V., or his grandfather Henry IV., he would have had little to fear. England had chosen him as king; the Parliament had accepted him; and it has always been held that Parliament could make whom it pleased king, without paying attention to the claims of birth. For instance, the house of Hanover was put on the throne by Parliament. But Henry VI., though very good and pious, was weak; and in his later years he went mad. During all his reign, too, everything went wrong at home and abroad. Many people, therefore, thought that it would be better to have a strong man like Richard of York as king.

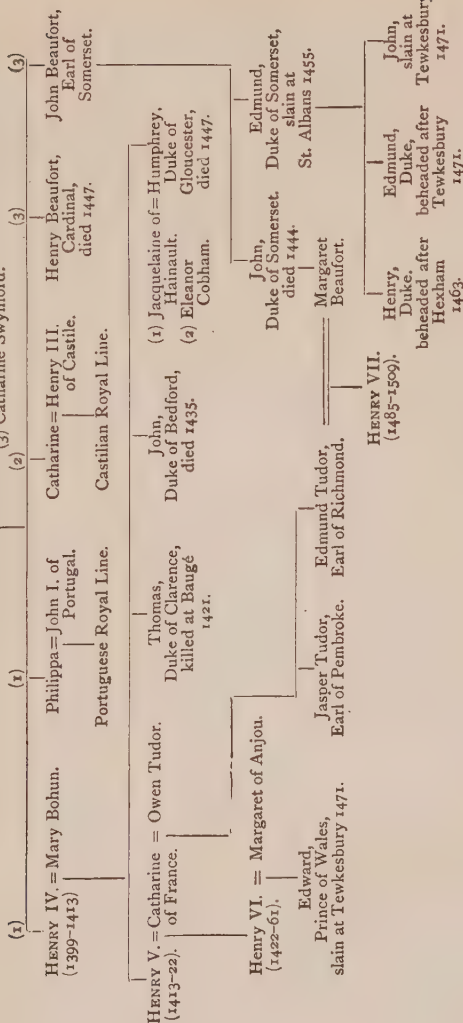

THE WHITE ROSE AND THE NEVILLES.

EDWARD III.
(1327-1377).

THE RED ROSE.

EDWARD III.
(1327-77).

John of Gaunt = (1) Blanche of Lancaster.
(2) Constance, daughter of Pedro the Cruel.
(3) Catharine Swynford.

It is needless for us to follow the course of the Wars of the Roses. A few main points are all we require. After five years of civil war Henry VI. was deposed, and Edward IV., the head of the Yorkists, was made king in his place. Edward had great difficulty in keeping the throne; indeed he was once driven from the kingdom and Henry VI. set up again. But Edward got back his power by hard fighting. His son, Edward V., a boy of thirteen, was deposed and murdered by his uncle, Richard of Gloucester, who made himself Richard III. After a reign of two years he was killed in battle, and the Lancastrian line was restored by Henry Tudor, Henry VII. He wisely married the heiress of the house of York, and so brought the struggle to an end (1485).

What we have to remark is, not the changes of kings, but the effect of the rivalry between the Red Rose of Lancaster and the White Rose of York upon England. To begin with, we have forty years of civil war, from the battle of St. Albans to the battle of Bosworth in which Richard III. was killed. During this time scarcely anyone cared for the law. The House of Commons was too weak to make men obey it; the Lords were all fighting on one side or the other. Thus we have some of the ill days of King Stephen over again. The barons kept armies of their own, consisting of retainers, as their men were called, who wore the crest of their lord and fought for him. Thus Warwick's men all wore the crest of the bear and the ragged staff, Holland's men the cresset, and Montagu's the dun bull. It is easy to understand that nobles with armies at their back did not care for the law. If a jury gave a verdict against them, the jurors were set on and beaten, perhaps even murdered. If a noble had a grudge against anyone, he would lead his men to besiege and plunder his enemy's house. In fact, throughout all England Might became Right.

Forty Years of Civil War and Lawlessness.

There were worse features in the Wars of the Roses than the disregard of law. We are accustomed to think of Britons fighting honestly, that is to say, choosing a side and sticking to it; and we expect that whatever happens they will give quarter to those who surrender, and will not kill their prisoners. Unfortunately, neither of these beliefs is true of the Wars of the Roses. Never, indeed, was there more treachery and more cruelty towards prisoners.

What, for example, could be more treacherous than the conduct of Lord Grey de Ruthyn at Northampton, when, instead of defending the Treachery. Lancastrian lines, he and his men assisted the Yorkists to mount over the rampart raised to keep them out. But this does not stand alone. Warwick the Kingmaker fought first for the Yorkists, and was at last killed while fighting for the Lancastrians at Barnet. The battle of Bosworth was decided by Stanley's troops deserting Richard III. and going over to the Lancastrian side in the midst of the battle. And what can exceed the treachery of Edward IV.'s brother, George of Clarence, that prince who we are told came to his end by being drowned in a butt of Malmsey wine? He betrayed his brother to Warwick, then betrayed Warwick to his brother. Rightly does Shakespeare call him—“False, fleeting, perjured Clarence”.

The war, too, is thick with examples of cruelty.

Every battle was followed by executions of the prisoners. Tiptoft, the Yorkist Earl of Worcester, a man of scholarship and refinement, to whom one might imagine brutality to be odious, yet earned the nickname of the Great Executions of Prisoners.

Butcher of England by the joy he took in having his captured foes executed. When at last he himself was beheaded England rejoiced. When the Lancastrians won Wakefield fight, Clifford and the queen, Margaret of Anjou, who led them, caused the head of Richard of York, who had fallen in the battle, to be cut off and placed on the gates of York, crowned with a paper crown, in mockery of his claims to the throne. After the second battle of St. Albans two Yorkist prisoners were brought before Henry VI.'s young son, Edward, then seven years old. The queen, his mother, bade him choose what death they should die. The boy answered, "Let them have their heads taken off". A few years later this same bloodthirsty child was stabbed at Tewkesbury, while fleeing, by Richard of Gloucester.

This man sums up all that is worst in the age. He has gone down to all time as the ruthless Richard Crookback, whomurdered the youngprinces Richard III. in the Tower. They were his brother Edward IV.'s children; they had been placed in his care; but they stood between him and the throne, and that was enough. They were both strangled at his orders by two ruffians employed by Sir James Tyrrell.

If Richard Crookback—Richard III. of England—is the worst of the Yorkists, he is matched in savagery by a woman, the Lancastrian queen, Mar- Margaret of Anjou. garet of Anjou. Her deeds at Wakefield and St. Albans have been already told. She was not an Englishwoman; we may be glad of it. It is true that she was brave and vigorous. She has sometimes won sympathy as the injured queen fighting for her husband, and as the mother who, when fleeing from a battle with her son, saved him from a marauder by saying boldly, "This is the son of your king"; but sympathy is wasted on her. She was as fierce as any lawless baron, and in treachery to the nation she outdid them all. It was she who urged the French in time of peace, and when her own husband was on the throne, to attack, burn, and plunder the town of Sandwich, which she knew would be undefended, because she thought that the disaster would make people blame the Duke of York, who was regent.

One other person remains for us to notice—Richard Neville, the great Earl of Warwick and Salisbury. Warwick the Kingmaker. No noble had ever been so powerful as he; none has ever been so powerful again. His lands lay in almost every shire in England. In the Midlands and in Wales whole counties regarded him as more their master than they did the king. He had many castles, and hosts of retainers. He it was who put Edward IV. on the throne: when in later years Edward offended him, Warwick drove him from the kingdom, allied himself with the Lancastrians, and restored King Henry VI. Thus he got the title of the "Kingmaker", for it seemed that he could make and unmake kings by his word. Edward IV. was never secure on his throne till he had beaten his former friend at Barnet, where, as was usual in those days, when all wore heavy armour, Warwick was too much encumbered to escape, and was cut down in the pursuit.

It was then the great barons who made the wars. They also suffered in them. When the Wars of the Roses came to an end, there were only a few barons left. They had perished in battle or under the headsmen's axe; and many had left no heirs. ^{Destruction of the Baronage.} At first the people of England as a mass cared little for either Lancaster or York. By degrees they came to hate both alike, and they determined to put a stop to such struggles for ever. The only cure, they saw, was the old cure, namely, to make the king so strong that no barons could stand against him. Hence we shall find the Tudor kings, who begin with Henry VII., very powerful and stern rulers. They are sometimes called despots, by which we mean kings who do what they please without consulting Parliament. It is true that the Tudors were despots; but they were so, because the nation made them so. England had no wish to have the Wars of the Roses over again.

XVI.—THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. FIRST PERIOD: ENGLAND CASTS OFF THE POWER OF THE POPE.

Henry VII. ruled from 1485 till 1509. Much of his time was spent in crushing the last embers of the Wars of the Roses. Thus he refused to allow the nobles to keep retainers who wore their lord's livery and fought for him as soldiers. To strengthen his position he collected a great hoard of money. He also tried to make himself more powerful by marrying his children to foreign princes and princesses. He gave his daughter to be the wife of James IV. of Scotland: we shall see the result of this by and by. He also married his son Henry to a Spanish princess, Catha-

Henry VII.; Marriages of his Children.

rine of Aragon. This also was one of the most important marriages ever made by English kings.

The first part of Henry VIII.'s reign was occupied with foreign politics. We need not try to follow Henry VIII., all that Henry did, but we must remember 1509-1547. the chief outlines, for foreign politics led to the most memorable event of the reign, the Reformation.

There were two great rivals in Europe at this time, the King of France and the King of Spain. The latter, Charles V., was, however, much more than King of Spain as we know it. He was ruler over the Low Countries (Holland and Belgium), and of part of Italy. He had also been elected emperor, that is to say, he was lord of Germany: and besides this, he was master of the riches of the New World, in consequence of the discoveries of Christopher Columbus, who had been employed by the Spanish government, and had sailed across the Atlantic to America in 1492. Between these two rivals Henry VIII. steered a middle course. His great minister, Cardinal Wolsey, thought that England could reap most advantage by making the rivals bid against each other for the aid of England. The result, however, was that both came to distrust and despise England. And so Wolsey, who hoped to be made pope, and trusted to the King of Spain to help him, found that Charles V. preferred to help someone who was a more faithful friend. Twice Wolsey was disappointed in his ambitions.

Meanwhile Henry had grown tired of his Spanish wife. She had borne him a daughter, but no son, and Henry wanted a male heir to the throne. Besides, he had fallen in love with Anne Boleyn. So he wished to be freed from

Rivalry of France and Spain; Wolsey.

The Divorce.

Photo. Valentine

FOUNTAINS ABBEY, YORKS, ONE OF THE MONASTERIES DISSOLVED BY HENRY VIII

Catharine: for this purpose application had to be made to the pope, and the king entrusted the business to Wolsey, who was at first not unwilling to do the King of Spain an ill turn. He did not expect to have much trouble in getting the pope to declare that the marriage had never been a true marriage.

However, the unexpected came to pass. The pope, Clement VII., did not wish to offend Wolsey and Henry VIII., but he feared to offend Charles V. of Spain a great deal more. Charles V. was Queen Catharine's nephew, and, as Charles had a big army in Italy, the pope did what he ordered instead of what Henry VIII. had asked. Henry did not get his way: his marriage was not declared to be invalid. But he was a headstrong man who could not bear to be thwarted. So he threw Wolsey into disgrace for his failure, and he quarrelled with the pope.

Now it happened that at this time it was easy to find grounds for a quarrel. Religion had become too largely a matter of forms and ceremonies merely. Even in the highest Martin Luther. places in the Church there were some who led evil lives, and had no real faith in what they taught. Many faithful sons of the Church thought that these things should not be, and a German friar named Martin Luther was led to believe a complete change was needed. In 1517 he "protested" against certain practices of the Church, and his followers, the first Protestants, converted a great part of Germany to agree with them and to cast off the authority of Rome, which meant casting themselves out of the Church.

It would have been simple, then, for Henry to side with Luther and become a Protestant. But this was not what Henry wished. The Pope, he argued, refused to free him from his marriage. Very good, he would break free from the pope; he would get rid of Catharine through his own courts; but he had no desire to change his beliefs as the Protestants were doing. He intended to believe what he had always believed, but he would not be controlled by the pope.

In this England was ready to follow him. Wyclif and the Lollards had felt the same more than a hundred years before, and the feeling of hostility had grown stronger with time. Henry casts off the Power of the Pope. Consequently, the Parliament which met in 1529, and is generally called the Reformation Parliament, eagerly backed up Henry in his schemes. First, it declared that all appeals to Rome, and appointments made by the pope, were illegal; then it ordered that no payments should be made to the pope; and finally, it passed the Act of Supremacy, which said that Henry was the head of the Church in England. The link that had bound England to Rome ever since the Synod of Whitby—nearly nine hundred years before—was broken.

Thus Henry became neither a Roman Catholic nor a Protestant. No one could call him the first, for he had defied the pope, and he beheaded as traitors those Catholics who refused to take the Oath of Supremacy, and acknowledge him as Head of the Church. It was for this reason that Sir Thomas More, the most learned man in England, was put to death. He was really no traitor, but he could not honestly say that he thought Henry VIII. was right. On the other hand, none could imagine Henry to be a Protestant, for he held to all the Roman Catholic doctrines, and commanded his subjects to believe them also, on pain of death. Protestants who wished to follow Martin Luther and reject some of the old beliefs were burnt as heretics. Strange as Henry's position may seem, most of his subjects agreed with him.

Two other events in the course of the Reformation are particularly noteworthy. The first is the dissolution of the monasteries. Monks were ^{The Monasteries} hateful to Henry, since they were not ^{and their Lands.} under the control of English bishops, but obeyed their own abbots, who were in their turn only obedient to the pope. The monasteries were very rich, and their wealth tempted the king. Finally, the monks were often lazy and sometimes ill-behaved; so that when the king caused an inquiry to be held, enough stories against them were collected to justify their being suppressed. Accordingly, in 1535 the smaller monasteries were broken up, and four years later the richer ones suffered the same fate. The king got an immense amount of property by this. Some he kept for himself, but much he gave to his nobles. This made the nobles support the Reformation, for they saw that if England were ever to return to the Roman Catholic Church, they would have to give up the monastic lands. But the poor suffered; the monasteries had been very charitable to them, and now many could hardly obtain bread. In consequence, we find that Henry VIII. and his successors had a great deal of trouble with beggars.

The other event that was of importance was a fresh translation of the Bible. This was mainly the work of Miles Coverdale. Thomas Cromwell, ^{Translation} the king's chief minister, and Cranmer, ^{of the Bible.} Archbishop of Canterbury, persuaded the king to allow it. First of all copies were placed in the churches, and afterwards anyone was allowed to keep a Bible in his home. Further, owing to the invention of printing, Bibles became cheaper, and so most men who could read were able to have one, a thing which was not possible in the old days when all books were in manuscript; that is to say, copied out by hand. The result of this was a steady increase in the Protestant party. Luther had taught men to look to the Bible and not to the pope as the source of what was right to believe. As soon as Bibles became common, it was certain that there would be more people anxious, not only to set aside the pope, but also the beliefs of the Roman Church.

Henry's reign was a time of great violence. We have seen how he treated Catholics who denied his Violence of the Time. supremacy, and Protestants who would not believe what he ordered. His ministers found him a dangerous man to serve. Wolsey was disgraced, and died of a broken heart; Thomas Cromwell, who succeeded Wolsey, was beheaded. Henry married six wives; two he divorced, and two were put to death on the scaffold. Nor was his reign free from rebellion. There was a rising in the north of those who disliked Henry's changes in religion, led by Robert Aske and the abbots of the great Yorkshire monasteries; but Henry had the leaders of this "Pilgrimage of Grace", as it was called, arrested and brought to the block. He had begun his reign as a most popular king; towards the end of it he was dreaded. Yet Englishmen went on supporting him because, although he was severe, yet upon the whole he knew what England wanted, and did it.

XVII.—THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. SECOND PERIOD. ENGLAND BE- COMES PROTESTANT.

Henry VIII. had left three children: Mary, daughter of his first queen, Catharine of Aragon; Elizabeth, daughter of his second queen, Anne Boleyn; and Edward, son of his third queen, Jane Seymour. Although the youngest, the son would in any case have been put before the daughters; further, Parliament had given to Henry the power of arranging the succession as he pleased, and he left the throne to Edward.

Edward VI. being only nine years old, the kingdom had to be directed by a regent. This office was placed in the hands of the Duke of Somerset, an ambitious, clever man, but rash and hasty. Urged on by Cranmer, he went further than Henry VIII. had done in religious matters. He did away with the mass, the Roman Catholic form of service, and issued a new service in English. He also gave orders that the images and pictures in the churches should be removed. This was done in a very unseemly way. Some of the men charged to carry out this duty paraded the country, dressed as mock priests in priestly garments, revelling and rioting, and casting the images and pictures into bonfires, with every sign of contempt. Devout men who had been accustomed to look on these images while engaged in their prayers, and who had been used since their childhood to think of them as holy, were much pained by behaviour which seemed to them impious. Out-of-the-way country districts were still on the whole 1547-1553.

Edward VI.,

Somerset makes a Reform in Doctrine.

Catholic in feeling, and did not favour the ideas of the Reformers, as did London and the large towns. There was a serious rebellion in Devonshire, and another in Norfolk, which were only put down by hard fighting.

Thus Somerset grew unpopular; men blamed him for what he had done, and also for many things for which he was not responsible.

His place was taken by Northumberland, who was a selfish man, only interested in maintaining his own power. He caused Somerset to be executed; and he carried the Reformation still further, because he thought that the Reformers were the only people who would support him.

One thing was clear. If Edward VI. was to die, Mary, who was a Catholic, would at once depose Northumberland; and Edward VI. was a very weakly boy. In a last hope of preserving his power, Northumberland caused his own son to marry Lady Jane Grey, who was a Protestant and had a claim to the throne. When, however, Edward VI. did die, no one would acknowledge Lady Jane as queen. Mary, 1553-1558. Mary was chosen, and she punished Northumberland by putting him to death, and soon afterwards caused both Lady Jane and her husband to be beheaded.

Mary was a Catholic, as her mother had been; she was also half a Spaniard. All her ideas turned to Catholicism and to Spain. She wished to restore the old religion, and she resolved to marry her cousin, Philip II., King of Spain. This was disastrous for England. It was bad enough for the country to return to the obedience of the pope. It was far worse to be ruled according

Northumberland and Lady
Jane Grey.

The Spanish
Match; Fear
of Spain.

to Spanish ideas, for Spain was the country of the Inquisition, the secret court which dealt with heresy. Everything about the Inquisition was detestable to English minds. It tried men in secret, whereas Englishmen had been used to open trials. The accused had no chance of hearing the accusation against him, or of meeting the witnesses face to face; he might be cruelly tortured, he might be imprisoned for years without a trial, and at the end, if found guilty, he would be burned. A great burning of heretics was called by the Spaniards an auto-da-fé, an "act of faith". None could think of an Inquisition in England without shuddering. Everyone dreaded what the half-Spanish Mary, impelled by her Spanish husband, might do.

Mary soon showed that there was good reason to fear her. In February, 1555, Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, was burned at the stake as a heretic. From that time onward till the end of Mary's reign, about ten persons were burned every month: the total mounts up to nearly three hundred. Even the Archbishop Cranmer was not spared. Every effort was made to lead him to declare himself a Roman Catholic: he was kept long in prison; he was sentenced to death, and then told that his life would be spared if he recanted; he was taken to witness the last agonies of his brother-Protestants being burned alive. In a moment of weakness he gave in; he signed a declaration that he had returned to the Roman faith. But the weakness passed, and when in spite of it he was burned, he thrust into the flames the erring right hand with which he had signed the cowardly document, that it might first be consumed.

Mary's Persecution; Death of Cranmer.

Three other bishops perished in the same way.

As a whole, however, the persecution fell upon the poorer classes. Unknown men went peacefully to the most horrible of deaths sooner than deny what they believed, or save themselves by a lie. The sight of this simple faith, which was not to be overcome even by the flames, did more to make men admire the Reformers, and seek to imitate them, than all Mary's cruelties could do towards terrifying them to be Catholics. They were obeying Martin Luther's stirring words:

“God's word, for all their craft and force,
One moment shall not linger,
But spite of hell, shall have its course,
'Tis written by His finger.
And if they take our life,
Goods, honour, children, wife,
Yet is their profit small,
These things shall vanish all;
The City of God remaineth.”¹

Bishop Latimer, when in the midst of the fire, showed the same spirit when he cried to his fellow-sufferer, Bishop Ridley, “Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, play the man; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out”.

Latimer was right. Englishmen had entered on Mary's reign still undecided, they came out of it convinced. They would have no more of the pope, no more of Spanish burnings. Elizabeth, the new queen, was of the same mind. She put an end to the fires in Smithfield, she refused obedience to the pope. The mass was abolished, and the service-book in English restored. She made no attempt to find

England becomes Protestant under Elizabeth, 1558-
1603.

¹ Martin Luther's hymn—translated by Thomas Carlyle.

out what men believed, or to punish them for it. All she desired was that they should worship peaceably, should go to church, and should acknowledge her as head of the National Church.

Thus after thirty years of struggle the Church of England finally won her freedom from the Roman see. But the end of religious troubles was not reached. There was a small party in England who thought it was wrong for Elizabeth to be head of the Church; they did not believe that the ^{Growth of a} Church required any head on earth. And ^{Puritan Party.} we shall see that this small party of Puritans by degrees grew powerful, and eventually threw the whole of Great Britain into confusion.

XVIII.—THE UNLUCKY HOUSE OF STUART.

Soon after Robert Bruce's death all that he had won came near to being lost. His son David II. was but four years old when he became king. Edward Balliol revived his father, John's, claims. He was aided by a number of English barons, who were striving to regain the lands in Scotland which they had held for a time, and had lost on the fall of the English power. The Scottish regent, Mar, was surprised and routed at Dupplin; and the year after, Edward III., who, seeing the chance of doing Scotland an injury, had taken up Balliol's cause, defeated the Scots at Halidon Hill, and overran the whole country. David had to be sent for safety to France.

Dupplin, 1332;
Halidon Hill,
1333.

Edward III. had done as much as his grandfather, but he could do no more. He could defeat the Scots in battle; the English archers proved as fatal to Scottish men-at-arms as they were to the French; but he could not conquer the country. Besides, he soon had, as we have seen, a French war on his hands; and by degrees Scotland slipped from his grasp. The castles were recaptured, and David returned to his kingdom.

One curse of Scotland—foreign invasion—was for the time stayed. Unluckily another soon appeared—
The Scottish Nobles. quarrels at home. For the next two hundred years it seems as if nothing but the presence of the hated English invader could unite Scotland, and keep king and nobles from flying at each other's throats. No two men had distinguished themselves more against the English than Douglas the Knight of Liddesdale, and Ramsay of Dalwolsy. They were comrades in arms, champions of the same cause. Yet no sooner was David II. restored to his throne than Douglas, jealous of an office given to Ramsay, treacherously seized his friend, and sent him
The House of Douglas. to starve to death in the dungeon of Hermitage Castle. The name Douglas, so gloriously borne by the Good Lord James, was to have an evil sound thenceforward in Scottish history; formidable indeed to foes, but equally dangerous to the peace of Scotland.

David died childless, and so the Bruce line came to an end. A grandson of King Robert's on the mother's side was given the crown. This was Robert Stuart, Robert II. [1371].

The House of Stuart may well be termed "The Unlucky House". Six kings, descended from Robert II., sat on the throne of Scotland. Of these only one, Robert III., had a peaceful end, and he, before his death, saw one of his sons cruelly murdered, and the other a prisoner in England. Robert III., too, was the only one to attain The Stuarts. old age; none of the others lived to be forty-five; three of them were cut off ere they had entered on the second half of life's natural span: James I. was murdered; James II. killed by the bursting of a cannon at the siege of Roxburgh; James III. assassinated; James IV. killed at Flodden; James V. died of a broken heart. It is a series of disasters, unparalleled in history. Yet, unlucky as the kings were, their country was even more so. Year after year and reign after reign, war follows rebellion and rebellion follows war, in dreary succession. Homes burnt, fields ravaged, invasions, defeats, raids from the Highlands, hangings, murders, come one after the other. National independence was a good thing, but no use could be made of it while there was neither order nor firm government. A king could do little for his people so long as his whole resources were being strained to crush the great families into obedience.

Robert III. had been ruled by his brother Robert, Duke of Albany. It was Albany and the Earl of Douglas who were concerned in the murder by starvation of the king's elder son. Robert III., 1390-1406. When the younger son, James I., was released from his captivity in England, his first step was to take vengeance on the Albanys. The old duke James I.,
1406-1437. was dead, but the king had his successor, Duke Murdac, and his two sons, executed. Severity was necessary: it was well-deserved. Unhappily a stern king was certain to raise up against himself enemies who hated justice and order. Sir Robert Graham formed a plot against the king's life. Late at night a sudden tramp of armed men was heard in the Abbey of the Black Friars at Perth, where the king was staying. James, fearing the worst, tore up the planks of the floor and took refuge in a vault below, while Catherine Douglas, one of the Queen's women, tried to secure the door by thrusting her arm across as a bolt. It was all in vain. A woman's slender arm was no bar to bloody-minded villains. The king's hiding-place was discovered. Graham leapt down and murdered him.

The heir to the throne was a boy of six. A regency James II., was necessary, and this, as usual, gave an 1437-1460. opening to rebellions and feuds. The great House of Douglas did not lose the opportunity. James II.'s reign was one long struggle with this lawless family.

The Douglasses were, in fact, as dangerous to the House of Stuart in Scotland as the Kingmaker had The House of Douglas. been in England to Henry VI. and Edward IV. William Douglas used to march at the head of an army against those who offended him; he had them put to death without trial; he burned their castles and seized their lands. He even executed Maclellan, the Tutor of Bomby, in defiance of the king's express command. Ferocious as the Douglasses were, the king was as merciless. One Earl of Douglas and his brother were invited to a friendly banquet in Edinburgh Castle, and there seized and beheaded. Crichton the chancellor was responsible for that deed; but the king soon copied it, stabbing another Douglas earl at Stirling with his own hand. For three years all Scotland was fighting either for James Stuart or James Douglas. It was only by acting on Archbishop Kennedy's advice—to deal with his enemies as a man would deal with a sheaf of arrows, breaking them singly, since they were too strong when bound together—that James II. triumphed. Bribery, promises of pardon or advancement, treachery, robbed Douglas of many of his followers. His army was routed by the Arkinholme, Scotts at Arkinholme. Douglas fled into 1455.

England, where he remained for twenty years. When he at last came back to Scotland, the king had him placed as a monk in the convent of Lindores, where he died. With him fell for ever the power of the elder line, the “Black” Douglas.

Struggling with the Scottish nobility was like encountering the Hydra; one head smitten off, straightway others reared themselves up in its place. Boyds, Homes, Hepburns, and Angus the “Red” Douglas, a younger branch, were even James III., more fatal to James III. than the Black 1460-1488.

Douglas had been to his father. James III. advanced to high office men who were not members of the nobility, such as Robert Cochran, an architect, whom he raised to be Earl of Mar. The turbulent nobles could not endure Cochran’s exaltation over them, and he was hanged from the Bridge of Lauder by Archibald Bell-the-Cat, Earl of Angus. Six years later Angus, aided by Homes and Hepburns, raised an army, captured the king’s son at Stirling, and made him march with them against his father. They met the king at Sauchie Burn. James III., fleeing from the field, was thrown from his horse, and carried, stunned and bleeding, into Beaton’s Mill.

Feebly he asked for a priest. A man calling himself such was brought in; bending Battle of Sauchie Burn, 1488. over the king on pretence of hearing his confession, he stabbed him to the heart.

With James IV. domestic disorder for a time died down. The king was strong, kept good order, and James IV., enforced the law. Yet it was his ill-fate to 1488-1513. plunge afresh into war with England, and bring on his country the greatest defeat in her history.

Henry VIII. had joined a league against France, and Louis XII., the French king, appealed to Scotland as the ancient ally of France. James determined upon war. He gathered the finest army Scotland had ever mustered and invaded England. Surrey encountered him at Flodden, not far from the junction of the Tweed and the Till. James allowed his adversary to appoint Flodden, a day of battle, and committed the blunder of 1513. refusing to let his artillery be brought to bear on the English columns crossing the bridge over the Till. The fate of the battle was at first doubtful. The Highlanders on the Scottish right were swept away by the English archers, but, on the other wing, Home with the Borderers rudely shook the English right and threw it into confusion. Here came the critical point of the battle. Home failed to follow up his advantage: his border-lances devoted themselves to plundering the English camp. On the other hand, Stanley kept his men in hand, and charged the Scottish centre in flank and rear. Closed in on every side, the Scots fought till night with brilliant but useless courage against English lance, bill, and bow.

“ But yet, though thick the shafts as snow,
 Though charging knights like whirlwinds go,
 Though bill-men ply the ghastly blow,
 Unbroken was the ring.
 The stubborn spear-men still made good
 Their dark impenetrable wood,
 Each stepping where his comrade stood
 The instant that he fell.”¹

¹ Marmion, Sir Walter Scott.

James IV. himself was killed in the midst of his nobility. There was hardly a house in Scotland that had not to mourn the loss of its best and bravest.

This disaster did not end at Flodden; it brought in its train another minority, and a fresh outburst of violence at home. Queen Margaret, the young king's mother, the Duke of Albany, and Angus the Red Douglas, all quarrelled over the regency. A fearful picture of the time is given us by the fierce affray in the High Street of Edinburgh between the Douglasses and the Hamiltons. The latter were routed, and their hurried flight gave the name "Cleanse the Causeway" to the affray. But what chance of prosperity and peaceful growth of trade was there, when the chief street of the capital could be the scene of bloody fighting?

Two attempts were made by Lennox and Buccleuch to release the king from the claws of Angus; both ended in defeat; in the last Lennox lost his life. At length the king fled by night from Falkland, and took refuge in Stirling Castle. The nobles, who had grown to hate the domineering sway of the Red Douglas as they had hated the Black, gathered in his support, and Angus was driven into exile.

James V., now grown to manhood, had a good idea of the duties of a king. He marched through the borders, and hanged the notorious border thief Johnny Armstrong, along with others of less renown; he reduced the Highland chiefs to some sort of obedience; he instituted the College of Justice, and encouraged arts and sciences; he also strove to find out about his people by going amongst them in disguise, and helping to do justice for those who were wronged. All this held out bright prospects for the future.

It was but a lull in the storm. Clouds soon gathered again; the waves of the Reformation began to trouble Scottish waters. Henry VIII. wished his nephew James to copy his example in casting off obedience to the pope. James would not do so. Gradually ill-feeling between the sovereigns ripened. War was declared in 1542, but James V. had not the advantages of his father. His nobles would not stand by him, some because he had reduced their privileges, others because they did not approve of further war with England. The army which he gathered at Fala Muir refused to follow him.

A second force of ten thousand men was raised and crossed the Esk. There the ill-feeling that existed between the King and many of his nobles was aggravated by the action of James who appointed his favourite, Oliver Sinclair, to the command of the army. This was done in a way that aroused the bitterest resentment. As soon as the little army had reached English ground, Sinclair produced the royal commission with which he had been secretly entrusted, and, as he stood on a platform borne Solway Moss, 1542. shouldered high, had it read aloud by a herald.

It was received with indignation; and the camp presented the sight of a disorderly mob. At this crisis there appeared a body of English cavalry some four hundred strong, that had been sent to reconnoitre. The leaders, Dacre and Musgrave, as soon as they had taken in the situation, availed themselves of it by charging headlong into the disorganized crowd. The Scots, taken by surprise, hardly attempted to make a stand, but fled wildly in all directions. There was no battle at Solway Moss; it was the rout of a rabble. It was a crushing blow to James, who, a few days later, died of grief.

Photo. Mansell

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS

From the portrait after François Clouet in the Wallace Collection

XIX.—MARY STUART AND THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.

When James V. lay dying of a broken heart, news was brought to him that his queen had given birth to a daughter. James groaned; he had hoped Mary Queen of Scots. for a son to continue the direct line of his house, and now this last hope was taken away. “It came with a lass, and it will go with a lass”, were his sad words. Soon after he died, leaving the little princess of a few days old as his successor. This princess was Mary Queen of Scots.

The position reminds us of a similar state of affairs more than two hundred and fifty years before, when the Maid of Norway was left heiress to the Scottish crown. Once again English policy turned to the idea of a marriage. Henry VIII. wished to marry his son, Edward VI., to Mary, and English
Marriage
Schemes. after his death Somerset the Protector held to the same plan. Yet both of them tried to gain their object in the most foolish way possible, namely, by violence. Henry sent a force which landed at Leith and burnt Edinburgh, but the Scots took their revenge by utterly overwhelming another army of the English at Ancrum Moor. Somerset was as unwise as his master. He sent an army under Lord Grey to invade Scotland. Grey met the Scottish forces at Pinkie, and in spite of the heroic resistance of the Scottish pikemen, at last defeated them by his superiority in firearms. The Scots were furious. Huntly well expressed the feelings of the nation when he told Somerset “he had no objection to the match, but to the manner of the wooing”. Mary was sent for safety to France, where she afterwards married Francis, son of the French King.

Before this, however, the Reformation in Scotland had begun. As in England, the printing of Bibles Reformation in Scotland. increased the number of those who began to think that both the government and the teaching of the Church was wrong. The Scottish Parliament gave all men leave to study the Scriptures in their own tongue; in consequence, we are told that "the Bible might be seen lying on almost every gentleman's table, the New Testament was carried about in many men's hands".

Cardinal Beaton, the head of the Church party, decided to make an example. He chose George Wishart. Wishart. who had made himself known by his fearless preaching against the Church.

First a priest tried to murder Wishart, but the preacher snatched from him the dagger hidden under his gown. Soon after Wishart was arrested, and condemned to be burnt as a heretic. Cardinal Beaton looked on from a window in his castle of St. Andrews while the deed was done.

Wishart's friends determined on revenge. They stole into the castle, stabbed Beaton, and hanged his Murder of Cardinal Beaton. body from the very window at which he had gloated over Wishart's death. Then they defended the castle against the regent's forces, and some time passed before they were overcome. Most of them were punished by being sent to the French galleys. There was, however, one amongst them, who, while tugging at his oar as a galley-slave, never lost the hope that he might be Knox. permitted to return to his country and carry on the work of the Reformation in the spirit of his dead friend Wishart. This was John Knox. It was not till some years later, however, that he was released.

Meantime the cause of Protestantism in Scotland was in grave danger. Mary of Guise, Mary Stuart's mother, became regent. She was a Roman Catholic and a Frenchwoman, Mary of Guise. and as, just at this time, Queen Mary married the Dauphin Francis, the whole power of France was placed at her service to crush the Reformers. Although at first she promised to be lenient, she was an enemy not less dangerous because she did not at once show her hostility. In a letter from Geneva Knox stirred up the Reformers to resist her, and in consequence certain nobles, Glencairn, Argyle, Morton, and others, formed an association to lead the Protestant party. The first act of these Lords of the Congregation, as they were called, was to demand that worship should be conducted in English, and that anyone might exhort and pray in his own house as he pleased.

The year 1558 saw the prospects of the Reformers brighten. Elizabeth succeeded her sister, and England finally threw off the yoke of Rome; but far more valuable than this was the return of Knox. Return of Knox. Men's epitaphs are often misleading, but the words on Knox's tomb tell us the naked truth about him, and reveal the secret of his power—"Here lies one who never feared the face of man". One who knew him bears the same testimony: "the voice of that one man is able in an hour to put more life into us than six hundred trumpets continually blustering in our ears". Soon after his return Knox preached a vehement sermon at Perth against idolatry. Some of his hearers suited their actions to what they took to be Knox's teaching. They threw down the images in the cathedral, and destroyed the pictures and the stained windows. The spirit spread from Perth to St. Andrews, Dundee, Linlithgow, Edinburgh, and all over the country. The greatest ruin fell on the monasteries. "Burn the nests and the rooks will fly", cried Knox. The monks were scattered, their churches and buildings unroofed, their lands taken by the nobles. We may regret the wanton destruction of cathedrals, abbeys, and churches, which has left Scotland so bare of fine buildings, but we need not be surprised at it. "Revolutions", it has been said, "are not made with rose-water"; and the Reformers wished to efface everything that might connect men's minds with the religion which they hated.

Nothing was left to the Regent but to use force. She obtained troops from France; the Lords of the Congregation gathered an army and besieged the French at Leith. At this critical moment, when it was not clear to which side victory would incline, help came from England. Elizabeth hated Knox for a book he had written against women-rulers, but she feared still more the danger of Scotland falling into French hands. She resolved to aid the Lords of the Congregation, so she sent a fleet into the Firth of Forth, and cut off the French supplies. This ended the contest. The Regent, Mary of Guise, died, and by the Treaty of Leith the French troops were to leave Scotland. Power was thus left in the hands of the Reformers, and so Scotland, Treaty of Leith, 1560. became avowedly Protestant.

Thus when after her French husband's death Mary in Scotland, 1561. Mary Stuart came back to Scotland, her position was one of great difficulty. She was Catholic, but her people were Protestant:

she was fond of France, but her people had grown to hate the French; she was the next heir to the English throne, but Elizabeth would not admit her claim. These things were all against her. Yet she had advantages. She was beautiful, and could persuade men to do what she wanted; and she was clever. Even Knox himself admitted that. "If there be not in her a crafty wit," said he, "my judgment faileth me."

It was not long before Mary showed this crafty wit. In spite of Elizabeth's opposition she made up her mind to marry her cousin, Lord Darnley. Marries Unluckily Darnley was not the right hus- Darnley. band for Mary. The two soon quarrelled. Darnley was angry because Mary would not let him be called king; and he was jealous of an Italian musician, David Rizzio, whom Mary employed as her secretary. Although a Catholic, he joined with the Protestant nobles to plot Rizzio's murder. Murder of One evening he came to Holyrood in com- Rizzio. pany with Ruthven, Morton, Lindsay, and others. Darnley went first into the queen's room, where she was sitting with Rizzio. He pretended he had come on a friendly visit, and put his arm round the queen's waist. Suddenly she was alarmed to see Ruthven clad in complete armour, ghastly pale of face, stalk into the room. Rizzio read his fate at a glance. He clung to the queen's skirts and cried for mercy, but he was in hands which knew no mercy. He was dragged into the next room and murdered.

If Darnley could be treacherous and merciless, there were others in Scotland who could Bothwell match him. James, Earl of Bothwell, ima- murders gined that he would please the queen if he Darnley. put Darnley out of the way. It is not clear that Mary knew of his intention, but what happened afterwards seems to show that Mary would not have felt any very strong disapproval if she had known. The facts were these: Darnley, who had been ill, was lodged at Kirk o' Field to recover. On Sunday, Feb. 9th, 1567, Mary visited him there: in the evening she returned to Holyrood, where she danced at a ball with Bothwell. As the dawn broke next morning, Edinburgh learnt with horror that Kirk o' Field had been blown into the air with powder, and Darnley murdered. Bothwell had planned the deed; he had even ridden straight from the ball at Holyrood to see it done.

None doubted that Bothwell was guilty; most believed that the queen knew of his design. It was impossible to bring the murderer to trial, as he filled Edinburgh with his followers, and his accuser feared for his life to appear. Bothwell's next act was to Mary marries Bothwell. carry Mary with him to Dunbar. As if to leave nothing undone that could shock or disgust her people, within three months of Darnley's murder Mary married the murderer.

This was beyond endurance. The nobles gathered an army, and met Bothwell's men at Carberry. It could scarcely be called a battle. Bothwell's followers deserted him in scores. Bothwell himself Carberry. had to flee for his life; he left Scotland, and at last was taken to Denmark, where he died in a Danish prison. Mary herself was shut up in Lochleven Castle. As the castle lay on an islet in the midst of the loch, it was thought that she could not escape. Her son James was declared king; Moray, who was Mary's half-brother, and had been her best minister, was made regent.

Yet Mary still had friends. She contrived to escape in disguise, and joined her adherents, the Hamiltons.

Moray saw there was no time to lose. Although he had but few soldiers, he advanced against the Hamiltons, met them at Langside, and routed them. Mary rode southward from the field, utterly desperate. In a last hope she resolved to throw herself on Elizabeth for help. Her letter to the English queen when she landed at Workington ran, "It is my earnest request that your Majesty will send for me as soon as possible, for my condition is pitiable, not to say for a queen, but even for a simple gentlewoman". Pity, however, was not the motive most likely to guide Elizabeth. Bad as Mary's fate had been, even worse was in store for her.

Mary escapes from Lochleven; Langside.

Mary flees to England.

XX.—ROYAL MARRIAGES.

We have already followed the important effects of one royal marriage—we have seen how Henry VIII. married Catharine of Aragon, grew tired of her, and in order to obtain the divorce which he wanted had quarrelled with the pope and the King of Spain, and had ended by breaking with the Roman Catholic Church altogether. But this is only one of a series of royal marriages which at this time influenced not only England and Scotland at home, but affected their dealings with the rest of Europe. There are several others; and we cannot hope to understand the history of England at this time, unless we grasp the importance of these marriages.

To do this we must put modern ideas quite out of our head. We do not pay much attention to the marriages of the royal family now. For instance, our royal family is related to that of Denmark, but we do not find on that account close alliance between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Denmark. We do not dream that if other heirs fail, the kingdoms would be united. But it was very different in the sixteenth century. Countries were then regarded as the property of their sovereigns. Should the ruler of Spain marry the ruler of England, it was thought that the two countries would naturally be united in policy; should there be an heir to such a marriage, he would naturally rule both countries. And besides this, it was felt that he would do his best to compel his dominions to hold the same religion as he held himself. So that on the result of a royal marriage there often hung not only the policy of a nation in its dealings with other nations, but also its religion and institutions; nay, even its separate existence as a nation might be in danger.

Under these circumstances, it is easy to see that royal marriages concerned England and Scotland very closely indeed. And it happened, by a curious chance, that just at this time, when both peoples were more interested in the question of their religion than anything else, their religion was apparently at the mercy of a marriage. For in England two queens, Mary and Elizabeth, came one after the other; and at the same time the ruler of Scotland was also a queen, Mary Queen of Scots, who was further the next heir to the throne of England. Thus both nations followed with strained attention the marriage proposals for these queens.

Mary of England, the queen whom we have seen Mary Tudor gain the opprobrious name of "Bloody Marries Philip II. Mary", herself a Catholic, the child of of Spain. a Catholic mother, married her cousin, Philip II. of Spain, a ruler who is known in

THE TUDOR LINE

HENRY VII.=ELIZABETH OF YORK.

Europe as the greatest persecutor of Protestantism who has ever lived. It is worth notice that the bitterness of Mary's persecution in England did not begin until after her marriage. Englishmen did not in those days think persecution wrong, but they did not give themselves enthusiastically to the task of burning heretics; that was a Spanish habit, partly inherited by Mary from her Spanish mother, but still more learnt from her Spanish husband. Had Mary and Philip had a child he would have united England to Spain, and gone on with the cruelties of his father and mother to the Protestants. But fortunately no child came. Thus England was saved from falling into the clutches of Spain; for the next heir was Elizabeth, and she was a Protestant.

Yet it seemed as if the evil day was after all only put off. We had exchanged a Catholic queen for a Protestant, and that so far was good. But a queen was always dangerous. Elizabeth would be sought in marriage too: it was not likely that so great a prize, the Queen of England, would lack offers. In fact she was besieged with offers, both from France and Spain. Philip II., in his anxiety to add England to his dominions, even thought himself of marrying Elizabeth, though she was his late wife's half-sister, and though such a marriage was absolutely forbidden by the Church. But Elizabeth, though she liked admiration and attention, and loved to coquet with her suitors, had no real wish to marry. To marry, she saw, would be to fall into the hands of a foreign prince. England, she declared, was her husband, and she remained a virgin queen.

This was satisfactory for the time, but gave at first little hope for the future. But if Elizabeth were to leave no heir, then Mary Queen of Scots would succeed her, and she too was a Roman Catholic, and what was worse, a woman who, by her marriage, would entangle England with some other state. And Mary, unlike Elizabeth, had no aversion to marriage. At the beginning of Elizabeth's reign Mary was wife to Francis II. the French king, also a Roman Catholic. It seemed as if England had escaped Spain only to fall into the jaws of France.

Difficulties of the Succession.

Mary Stuart's
First Marriage.

Here again fortune fought for us. There was no child of this marriage either; and Francis II. died while still a young man, after only a few months of rule. Thus no heir was left to unite the crowns of Scotland and France, with the probability of some day adding to them that of England; and Mary Queen of Scots was more or less cut off from her alliance with France that might have proved so dangerous. She married, as we have seen, a second, and even a third time; first her cousin, Lord Darnley, and afterwards the Earl of Bothwell. But these were not dangerous royal marriages, for they did not give foreign states any claims over England or Scotland.

Now it is time to recall to our memories who Mary Queen of Scots herself was. She too was the descendant of one of these royal marriages so important in this age. She was the grandchild of James IV. of Scotland and Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII. of England. This was her claim to the English throne. And by her second husband, Darnley, she had a son James.

Mary's claim on England.

If this son were to live he would unite the thrones of England and Scotland. Little objection could be found to a union of this sort: it was the union of two kingdoms in the same island, with people of the same language, and interests similar, and, above all, both in the main Protestant. One thing indeed looked bad. James Stuart was likely to be of his mother's religion, a Roman Catholic.

This difficulty, however, vanished with the others. When after Mary's defeat at Langside she took refuge in England, Elizabeth kept her a prisoner there. It was natural that her Catholic friends should make Plots against Elizabeth. plots on her behalf, all the more that they were stirred up by the Spaniards to do so. First came an insurrection in the north of England, led by the Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland. Then at intervals of a few years came Ridolfi's plot and the Jesuit plot, headed by a priest named Campion, and finally Babington's plot, all with the same object, namely, to murder Elizabeth and put Mary on the throne. As Elizabeth found Execution of Mary. Mary a continual source of danger, we need not be surprised that she at last caused her to be beheaded. Such an act may perhaps be excused, but it cannot be commended. Mary had come to her for assistance; instead of getting it, she had been kept a prisoner nineteen years. Mary no doubt had plotted; but Elizabeth had done nothing to win the slightest gratitude from her, nor had she left her any hope of escaping, except by plots.

The result of Mary's long imprisonment and death had been to leave her son James, King of Scotland

James VI. brought up a Protestant. and next heir to the throne of England, in the hands of her enemies in Scotland, who brought him up as a Presbyterian.

We shall see that he did not keep to this church, but he always remained a Protestant, and as such England was ready to welcome him as king. Thus, when Elizabeth died the two crowns were united in one person. The two nations so long ^{Union of} the Crowns. apparently hopeless enemies, became reconciled, and James VI. of Scotland became James I. of England.

XXI.—ELIZABETH AND THE ARMADA.

Elizabeth's reign is striking from whatever point of view we look at it. It sees the establishment of the English Church, and the preparing of the way for the Union of the crowns of England and Scotland; it is marked by important social legislation—questions of wages, of coinage, of poor relief, are all dealt with, and upon the whole successfully; it is the age of the great poets, Shakespeare and Spenser. Any one of these things would be enough to ^{British} stamp a reign as remarkable. Yet there is ^{Maritime} something beyond all this; for it is in this ^{Policy.} reign that British policy, as we know it, is settled. Britain is to be strong at sea, and to spread her power over distant colonies.

There was nothing in Mary Tudor's reign that made Englishmen feel more shame than the loss of Calais. It had been in English hands since the days of Edward I.; it seemed disgraceful to lose it. But in truth Calais was no longer of any use. The old policy of trying to conquer territory from the King of France was dead and gone. Even the enmity was gone too. Englishmen no longer ^{Hostility to Mari-} hated France, but Spain. And Spain ^{time Spain makes} being strong at sea and in the New ^{England Maritime.} World, England had to look to her fleets. Since we had to fight against a maritime and colonial power, we became maritime and colonial ourselves in doing it.

Although in name Elizabeth did not go to war with Spain till 1587, yet in reality all her reign was one long war. The war differed from any war England had fought before, since it went on, far from Europe, in the Spanish main, and on American shores. It was not called war; neither Queen nor Parliament admitted its existence. It was the work of the Adventurers—The Adventurers, merchants and nobles who sent out ships to the Spanish main, ready to trade or plunder as might be most convenient. The Adventurers were not indeed strait-laced. Hawkins, for example, thought nothing of taking slaves from Africa to the Spanish settlements, and compelling the Spaniards, by force of arms, to buy them. But still the slave-trader Hawkins and the buccaneers were the forerunners of the makers of our empire. They went where gain drew them, reckless of danger, and where they went British power followed.

Francis Drake stands as an example of all that was best in the Adventurers. He feared no odds against him; he it was who led seventy desperate Englishmen to attack the fortified Drake. Spanish town of Nombre de Dios in Central America—the Treasure House of the World as it was called, since the Spaniards sent thither all the silver they collected—and took it; he, again, crossed the isthmus of Panama, and surprised trains of mules laden with Spanish silver; he, too, was the first Englishman to sail into the Pacific. The Spaniards had thought themselves safe there. Drake came down on them like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, sacked the towns of Lima and Callao, captured a great galleon laden with treasure, and then continued his daring voyage round the world. He came back to England after four years with more treasure than ever had been brought before. It was vain for Philip the Spanish king to complain to Elizabeth that Drake was a pirate. Elizabeth might promise redress, but she never gave it. On the contrary, she accepted a share in Drake's plunder.

For many years the King of Spain did not do anything open against Elizabeth. He encouraged those who wished to murder her, but to take an open part against her would have thrown England on the side of his rival France. But when Mary died she left her claims on the throne of England to the King of Spain. Philip therefore declared war; it was decided to send a huge fleet, the "Invincible Armada", to England, and conquer it once and for all.

The Armada set sail in 1588. That it had not started the year before was due to Drake, who had sailed into Cadiz harbour and set on fire all the ships laden with stores which had been collected there. He called his exploit "singeing the King of Spain's beard". Great as was the damage he did, it was repaired by the industry of the Spaniards. All was carefully arranged: the Duke of Medina-Sidonia was placed in command; the Armada was to sail up the Channel and pick up the Spanish army from Flanders. Then it was thought that to land it in England and conquer Elizabeth would be child's play. The Spanish troops were the best in Europe; and no Spaniard dreamed that English ships could possibly resist the Armada. Philip trusted also that the English Catholics would fight for him instead of for their Protestant queen.

Photo. Mansell

THE DEFEAT OF THE SPANISH ARMADA

From a contemporary engraving

Never did man make a more gigantic mistake. Catholics and Protestants alike thronged to the army which Elizabeth collected at Tilbury. The fleet itself was put under the command of a Catholic, Howard of Effingham. Elizabeth knew her people. "Let tyrants fear!" said she; "I am come amongst you to lay down my life for my God and for my kingdom and for my people. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart of a king, and of a king of England too, and think foul scorn that Spain or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm." Good as the Spanish troops were, it may well be doubted if they would have found England so easy a prey as they expected.

They were not destined to have the chance of trying. England had another line of defence, her right arm, her navy. The Armada had to reckon with that first.

When the news was brought to Plymouth that the Armada had been sighted, in mighty array, stretching over seven miles of sea, the English commanders were ready, but there was no haste or confusion. Drake, engaged at the time in a game of bowls on the Hoe at Plymouth, cried, "Let us finish this first; time enough to beat the Spaniards afterwards". When the English ships got to sea, they hung on the heels of the Spaniards on their leisurely way up the channel. They were more than a match for their big opponents; they could sail faster and manœuvre better; they were much better shots, for in truth the Spaniards fired so high that most of their powder was wasted.

For a week the two fleets battled; a week of such anxiety was never known in England before or since. The Armada It was clear that the Armada could not at Calais. beat the English; but could Howard and the captains under him beat the Armada? Some Spanish ships had been sunk, yet the Armada was still a mighty fleet when it reached Calais. So far it was successful.

Here, however, the plan broke down. Parma and the Spanish troops were being kept close prisoners, blockaded by the Dutch ships. Without an army Philip's invasion was impossible.

Yet Howard saw that the Spaniards could not be left to rest at Calais. Parma might come overland and join them. Accordingly fire-ships The Fire-ships. were got ready, smeared with tar and loaded with gunpowder, and at nightfall set drifting into Calais harbour. As, flaming and exploding, they drew near the Spaniards, the Armada was thrown into confusion and stood out to sea. Wind and waves rose, driving the Spaniards first towards the Dutch coast and then northwards. Drake

The Armada driven Northwards and destroyed by Storms. followed them far up into the North Sea; he would have gone farther, but powder was running short on his ships. Still, his part was done: storms did the rest. Ship after ship of the Armada was cast ashore on the Scottish and Irish coasts. The mighty fleet that had numbered 150 vessels when it left Spain, returned with 54 battered hulks.

The victory was striking and complete. It saved England from all fear of invasion. But it did much more than that; it determined the future of England. Our interests were no longer bounded by our own isle. Even before the Armada Englishmen had planned settlements in America. It was left, indeed, to the next reign to establish them. Henceforward, however, English interests were on the ocean and abroad. We shall see England, after overcoming Spain at sea, master in turn Holland and France. Our seamen have read Europe many lessons on the value of sea-power. No more effective one was ever given than that afforded by the story of the Armada.

XXII.—THE STUARTS AND THEIR DIFFICULTIES.

With the reign of James I. we enter on a new period. Hitherto interest had centred round the king, or round the Church, or round the nobles, or in war. Now a new matter eclipses all the others. Everyone's eyes are fixed upon James I., 1603-1625;
Parliament. Parliament. Parliament displays quite new vigour. Under the Lancastrian kings it had been too weak to keep the nobles in order; under the Tudors it was too anxious for a strong king to care to oppose him. But in the time of the Stuarts we see Parliament engage in struggles with the king, and come out in the end the victor. We are, indeed, at the beginning of the modern system, by which it is no longer the crown that rules, but Parliament.

It was natural, then, that the Stuarts, who expected to rule as the Tudors had done—that is to say, despotically, without consulting parliament—should find themselves in difficulties. James I. disagreed with his Parliaments. His son, Charles I., Quarrels between the Stuarts and Parliament. quarrelled with them even more, and at last actual war began. Three main grounds of quarrel may be distinguished: (1) over religion at home; (2) over religious matters abroad; (3) over the right of the king to take money and govern without Parliament.

1. James had been brought up in Scotland as a Presbyterian, but he changed over to the Church of England. He was not, however, a bigot by nature. What he wanted was that men should, as far as possible, agree to accept him as head of the Church. This claim was disagreeable to the Catholics, who regarded the pope as the head of the Church, and also to the English Puritans and the Scottish Presbyterians, who thought the Church should govern itself. All chance of liberty of worship for Catholics was soon put out of the question by the violence of a few murderous traitors. Catesby, Gunpowder Percy, Sir Everard Digby, and some Plot, 1605. others formed an atrocious plot to blow up king, Lords, and Commons assembled in Parliament; to this they added a wild scheme of raising a rebellion, seizing James's daughter, Elizabeth, bringing her up as a Catholic, and placing her on the throne. The secret leaked out; the cellars below Parliament were searched, and Guy Fawkes was found in the midst of his powder barrels. The leaders of the plot were either shot down or executed. For the whole Roman Catholic party the result was disastrous. During long years afterwards everyone regarded them as traitors at heart.

The Puritans also came to dislike the King more and more. At the beginning of the reign they presented a great petition against certain ceremonies of the Church; they did not wish to use a ring in marriage, or the sign of the cross in baptism. But the king did not yield. He fell much into the hands of the bishops, for he claimed to rule by divine right, and it was the clergy and the bishops who were the most thorough-going supporters of this claim. Hence James's saying, "No bishop no king". It was easy to see that this attitude was much disliked among his Scottish subjects, who hated bishops. Indeed James's Scottish bishops had very little power, and received very little obedience.

2. James managed to offend the religious feelings of a large number of his subjects as much by his foreign policy as by his acts at home. He wished to be a great peace-maker in Europe; with this object he strove hard to arrange a marriage between his son Charles and the Infanta, the Princess of Spain. James's subjects hated Spain. They were much more ready to fight her than to make an alliance. They remembered the days of Mary Tudor, and they hated the idea of another Spanish match. The marriage, indeed, fell through, and instead Charles married Henrietta Maria, sister of the French king. She, too, was disliked because she was a Roman Catholic; it was feared that she might convert her husband, or at any rate bring him to favour English Roman Catholics. This belief, although not true, did much to make Charles's subjects distrust him. And even when James and Charles did act, as the nation wished to see them act, on the Protestant side, they were very unsuccessful. James's daughter Elizabeth married the leader of the German Protestants, Frederick the Elector Palatine; but Frederick was turned out of his dominions by the Spaniards, and James could not recover them for him, either by Treaty or by fighting. And Charles sent a fleet under Buckingham to help the French Protestants at La Rochelle against the

Religious Policy Abroad.

Marriages.

King of France, but it was beaten off, and returned in disgrace.

3. The most bitter quarrels, however, were with Parliament. James held that kings reigned by divine right; their power was given them from on high; they were "the Lord's anointed", and resistance to them was sinful. Thus James, and Charles after him, thought it to be beneath their dignity to defer to Parliament. Yet according to the constitution Parliament alone had the power of granting money, and without money a king was in a sorry position. Both James and Charles tried to override Parliament by the use of the king's power—what was called the "Royal Prerogative". Unluckily for them, the Puritan and Presbyterian party was strong in Parliament, and these, already angered by James's fondness for bishops and his hankerings after a Roman Catholic marriage for his son, were by no means inclined to give way about money.

In the struggles between James and Charles and their Parliaments two main points may be remarked:

Question of Supplies. (1) Parliament was resolved to prevent the king from raising money on his own authority; (2) it strove also to make his ministers responsible for what they did.

Thus in James's reign the Commons objected to the grants of monopolies, by which some friend of the king was given the sole right of selling an article, and could in consequence put a high price on it. In Charles's reign they went further. Instead of giving the king certain taxes for life, they only gave them for two years; and when Charles tried to collect them without leave, they made him accept the Petition of Right, 1628. Petition of Right, which declared that to take taxes except by leave of Parliament was illegal, and that no one should be imprisoned without trial by command of the king. Thus the two most important clauses of Magna Carta were solemnly repeated.

Again, Parliament attacked the king's ministers. The Lord Chancellor Bacon was impeached for taking bribes; the Earl of Middlesex was impeached for misusing public money; the Duke of Buckingham was impeached for failing in the war against Spain. This "impeaching" was a system whereby the Commons accused a man before the Lords as judges. In those days it was the only way to get rid of a king's minister who was disliked. Never before had Parliament interfered so much with the king's ministers.

In the first four years of his reign Charles had three Parliaments, and quarrelled with them all. Then he decided to do without Parliament, and for eleven years no Parliament met. Men called it the Eleven Years' Tyranny. Charles's ministers ruled the country for him. Strafford was sent to Ireland, where he drilled an Irish army, and persuaded the Irish Parliament to vote the king money. Lawyers, such as Noy and Finch, set to work to revive old practices by which the king could get money without asking Parliament for it. For example, they advised him to collect "ship-money", a tax which had fallen on sea-coast counties to provide a fleet in time of war. Charles imposed it in time of peace on inland counties. A squire named John Hampden refused to pay it, saying it was illegal since Parliament had not voted it. The case was tried, but the judges were afraid of the king, for he could remove them from their posts if he was displeased with them, so they decided against Hampden. The Court of Star Chamber inflicted heavy fines on all who wrote or spoke against the king; the High Commission Court Star Chamber. dealt in the same way with the Puritans. Men were tried before these courts without a jury, and were often condemned to have their ears cropped or to be cruelly flogged. Archbishop Laud ruled the Church, and tried to establish the worship of the Church of England all over Charles's dominions.

This, however, proved fatal to Charles's plan of absolute rule. With the very strictest care it was only just possible for him to get money enough to carry on the government in time of peace. If a war was to break out, it was clear that he would be forced to call a Parliament to vote money for it. We shall see that Laud's action did provoke a war, and with that war the Eleven Years' Tyranny came to an end.

XXIII.—WAR BETWEEN KING AND PARLIAMENT.

In spite of James's efforts to set up bishops in Scotland, the Scottish Church had practically done as it pleased. It was governed by an assembly; it did not keep the feasts of the English Church such as Easter and Christmas; and its ministers prayed as they chose instead of using the service-book. Charles's Service-book in Scotland. Charles, egged on by Laud, made up his mind to reduce the Presbyterians to obedience. He caused a service-book to be prepared, and bade the Scottish ministers to use it.

What happened is well known. Everyone remembers Jenny Geddes, who cried out in the Church of St. Giles at Edinburgh, "Wilt thou say mass at my lug!" and flung a stool at the clergyman's head. It was a homely act, but it marked the beginning of the downfall of a king. Resistance spread fast in Scotland. Bodies of men called the "Tables" were organized to consider what course to take. Henderson and Johnston of Warriston drew up the Covenant by which the oath was ^{The Covenant,} taken to defend the Scottish form of worship. Speedily it became clear that Scotland was in revolt. If Charles was to regain his power it must be by war.

War then became inevitable; but Charles was from the first doomed to failure. Yet failure meant another Parliament; the meeting of another Par- ^{The Bishops'}liament meant the downfall of Charles's ^{War, 1639-1640.} absolute government. All fell out as his wisest ministers had foreseen: Charles had no regular troops and no officers, while Alexander Leslie could muster 16,000 Scots, many of whom were tried soldiers. In the first campaign Charles dared not strike a blow; in the second his raw levies fled before the Scottish Covenanters at Newburn. The Scots marched into Yorkshire, and Charles had to beg for a truce. The Scottish victory in this "Bishops' war" was the first step in the final triumph of Parliament over the king.

In 1640 Charles called two Parliaments. The first, the "Short" Parliament, was fairly friendly to him, but he was unwise enough to dismiss it. The second, which was not finally dissolved for nineteen ^{The Long} years, and thus gained the name of the ^{Parliament.} "Long" Parliament, was the body that was destined to see him dethroned and beheaded.

No such violent ideas entered the heads of the members at first. Led by Pym and ^{Reform; Execu-}Hampden, they were bent on reform; ^{tion of Strafford.} they intended to make Charles rule according to the law. Therefore they swept away the Star Chamber and the High Commission Court; they passed a bill that Parliament was to meet every three years; they declared all the king's plans for raising money without leave of Parliament illegal. Of one man only they determined to make an example. This was Charles's chief minister, Strafford. To find ground for condemning him was not easy. At last it was shown that he had said to Charles, "Your majesty has an army in Ireland which you may employ here to reduce this kingdom". Strafford urged that this kingdom referred to rebellious Scotland. His enemies took it to mean England, and Strafford was voted to be a traitor, and executed. It is hard to say that the act was just, but Parliament felt that he was too dangerous to be allowed to live. "Stone dead hath no fellow" was the opinion of many about Strafford.

The king's illegal powers had been destroyed. He had promised to amend. Moderate men thought enough had been done; they were not Arrest of the five Members. inclined to press him too hard. But Charles was, throughout all his life, his own worst enemy. Just when he was beginning to be trusted, he showed that he was quite unworthy of trust. Followed by a band of armed attendants he went down to the House of Commons to arrest by force Pym, Hampden, and three others, who were the chief leaders against him. He failed; the members had had timely warning. As he said himself, "the birds had flown". But this could lead but to one thing—war between King and Parliament. Promises were useless, the matter had to be fought out.

The Civil war falls into three periods. In the first the king had the upper hand. His followers were naturally better soldiers, more used to horses and War; Royalists arms than were the citizens who at first successful. made up the Parliamentary armies. Charles, too, had a dashing cavalry leader, his nephew, Prince Rupert, whose charges bore down his opponents' ranks. The Parliament fought hard, but steadily lost ground. Once the king drew quite close to London, but he did not dare to attack in force. None the less he seemed to be on the point of triumphing.

Pym saw that help must be got from somewhere, so he made an alliance with Scotland. The Parliament signed the Solemn League and Pym gets help from the Scots. Covenant, promising to establish Presbyterianism in England, and the Scots were to send an army to help against Charles. The alliance was easy to make, for most of the Parliamentary party at the time favoured the Presbyterian system. This "throwing of the Scotch sword into the balance" turned the scale against Charles. His generals, Rupert and Newcastle, were utterly beaten at Marston Moor. All the north was lost to the king.

Marston Moor, however, was not so much a triumph for the Scots, who did not do a great deal towards the victory, as for an English Roundhead named Oliver Cromwell. Cromwell and the Ironsides. Cromwell had raised a regiment of his own. He saw that discipline and zeal alone could beat the loyalty of the Cavaliers. His troopers were well-drilled, terrible fighters, who earned for themselves the name of Cromwell's Ironsides. They were godly men also, who thought themselves to be a chosen people fighting the Lord's battles against the Cavaliers, whom they called the Philistines. Cromwell was not a Presbyterian, but an Independent. He thought all should be allowed to worship as they pleased; consequently all the sects looked up to him as their leader. Further, since Pym and Hampden, the first great leaders, were both dead, Cromwell had no rival. When by the Self-denying Ordinance Parliament voted that its members were no longer to hold posts in the army, a special exception was made in favour of Cromwell. Thus he was bound to become the most powerful man in the realm, for he was the one link between Parliament and the army. And when in 1645 Parliament gave him the task of forming a New Model army, he included many of his friends, the Independents, in it. All the ^{The Independ-}officers were Independents. Thus the ^{dent Army.}New Model became the army of the sects, a church in arms. Cromwell was not a man for half-measures like the early Parliamentary leaders. "If I met the king in battle," he said, "I would fire my pistol at him as I would at any other man." His army met the king at Naseby, and routed him so completely that Charles had scarcely a regiment left. [1645.]

One last flicker of hope remained for the king. He was beaten in England; but in Scotland Montrose, marching from the Highlands, had over-^{Montrose.}thrown every force the Covenanters could bring against him. In one year he won five victories; there was nothing to prevent him from marching into England. His Highlanders, however, scattered; they could not stand a long campaign. Thus deprived of half his army Montrose was surprised on a misty morning by David Leslie at Philiphaugh, and routed.

Charles, being now without supporters, surrendered to the Scots at Newark. But he could not grant what they wanted, namely the establishment of Presbyterianism, and he annoyed them by his shuffling, so they gave him up to Parliament. Parliament in return promised to discharge the Scottish arrears of pay.

Charles Surrenders to the Scots, and is given up to Parliament.

Charles was not sorry to be free from the Scots. He knew that between the Independent Army and the Presbyterian Parliament there was no love lost. He thought that by playing off one against the other, he might get back his power. Unluckily he only made each party distrust him more and more, and to make matters worse war broke out again.

2nd Civil War.

There was a rising of Royalists in Kent and Essex, while Hamilton, with a body of Scots who dreaded the power of Cromwell and the Army, invaded Lancashire. Cromwell marched north and defeated Hamilton at Preston. But this fresh outburst of war made the Ironsides think that there could be no peace while the king was alive, and the army came back to London, resolved to call "that man of blood, Charles Stuart," to account.

It is important to notice that the final measure, the execution of the king, was the work of the Independent party, the Army, headed by Cromwell. Parliament would not agree to bring the king to trial till Death of the King the Work of the Army, 1649.

Cromwell sent down a file of musketeers to the House and turned out the moderate Presbyterian members. The court that tried Charles was made up chiefly of Independents. The great mass of Englishmen was opposed to his execution. Scotland, as we shall see, was driven into war by it. The king's dignified behaviour on the scaffold made many men think him a martyr. But for the time the Army was supreme. There was none left who could resist it.

XXIV.—BRITAIN GOVERNED BY AN ARMY.

So far from making things more simple, Charles I.'s execution only led to more confusion. Many Englishmen thought the execution little better than a murder, but Parliament and the Army had seemed to agree about it, and for the moment nothing could be done against them. Yet while in England the office of king was abolished, and a Commonwealth set up in its place, both Scotland and Ireland recognized the king's son as King Charles II., and were ready to fight for him. Hence, for the present, Parliament had to support the Army, in order that it might subdue its enemies.

The turn of Ireland came first. Cromwell went over with his Ironsides. The Irish troops held the town of Drogheda against him. The town was stormed, and Cromwell bade his men give no quarter. All the defenders were massacred. This violent and ruthless act so terrified the Irish that after it little resistance was made. Charles II.'s general and soldiers were driven from the country. The Irish Parliament was abolished, and instead Irish members were to be sent to Westminster.

Scotland, however, cost Cromwell more trouble. There two parties were trying to come to an agreement with Charles II. The Presbyterian party was willing to have him back if he would take the Covenant. Montrose offered to restore him the kingdom, by the aid of a Highland

Result of the King's Execution.

Ireland.

Scotland;
Death of Montrose.

army, without any conditions. Charles tried Montrose first. But when Montrose landed in Scotland and began to gather the clansmen he was defeated and captured. No one could forgive him for the cruelty which his Highlanders had shown in his former rising, so he was put to death.

Charles then fell back on the Covenanters, headed by Argyll. He came to Scotland and took the Covenant. Cromwell at once made Charles II. and the Covenanters; ready an army to invade Scotland, but Dunbar, 1650. David Leslie, who commanded the Scots, was every whit as able a soldier as Cromwell. He laid waste the country north of Berwick through which Cromwell would have to march, and retired to a strong position near Edinburgh. Cromwell tried to tempt him from it, but in vain. At last, wearied out by want of food and long marching, the Ironsides fell back to Dunbar. Leslie followed, drew up his army on Doon Hill overhanging the Dunbar Road, and seized the defile at Cockburnspath, which cut off Cromwell's retreat. Cromwell appeared to be in a trap. It was hopeless to attack the Scots on Doon Hill, since they numbered two to one. It seemed that he must surrender, or retreat into his ships. Suddenly the Scots threw away the victory that was almost won. Fearing that Cromwell was embarking his men, and would so slip through his fingers, Leslie ordered an attack. Cromwell saw the mistake. "The Lord hath delivered them into my hands", he cried. The Ironsides fell on the Scottish right wing, and rolled it back in confusion on the centre; soon Leslie's whole force gave way. In the pursuit the Scottish army was almost destroyed.

All Scotland south of the Forth fell into Cromwell's hands as the fruit of his victory. Leslie, however, gathered another force, and entrenched himself near Stirling. Cromwell crossed the Firth of Forth and began to ravage Fifeshire. This left the road to England open, and Charles promptly took it. At the head of 18,000 men he marched south. The Ironsides were soon at his heels. He was headed off from the London road, and at last brought to bay at Worcester. The battle which followed Cromwell called his "crowning mercy". Charles's men were scattered; the king himself had to flee for his life; for six weeks he wandered about in hourly peril. At last he escaped to France.

Battle of Worcester,
1651.

Meanwhile with the last Scottish army thrown away in England, Monk, whom Cromwell had left to command in his place, had an easy task. The country was subdued, even the Highlands were pacified. The Scottish Parliament was done away with, though it was restored at the Restoration.

Abolition of Scottish Parliament.

Cromwell and his army of Independents seemed invincible. They had conquered the Royalists, Presbyterian Scotland, and Catholic Ireland. They had laid low a king and two Parliaments. Now we shall see them continue their work by subduing the English Parliament also.

Part of the work indeed had been done already, when Colonel Pride, by Cromwell's orders, had "purged" Parliament of the ninety leading Presbyterians who opposed the king's trial. But even the "Rump", as the remaining members were contemptuously called, fell to quarrelling with the Army. Cromwell wished them to dissolve and call a new Parliament; they refused, unless it was laid down that they were all to have seats in the new Parliament; they also

The "Rump" Dissolved by the Army.

urged that the Army should be disbanded. At last Cromwell lost patience. He went down to the House himself, banged his fist on the table, and bawled out, "Get you gone! Give place to honest men." His soldiers poured in and turned out the members by force.

This was one way of settling the question, but it was not the right way. King had gone and House of Lords had gone; the House of Commons was the last relic of legal government left. Now that had gone too, destroyed by military violence. Many people had despised the "Rump", but they did not approve of this way of getting rid of it. Failure of Cromwell's Parliaments. Consequently, none of Cromwell's later schemes for new Parliaments were ever successful. He tried first an assembly of "faithful persons, fearing God and hating covetousness", recommended by ministers throughout the country. These were called in mockery "Barebone's Parliament", from the name of one of the members, "Praise-God" Barbon. This assembly soon resigned its power to its maker, Cromwell. Thrice again, under different arrangements, Parliaments were called, but with none of them could Cromwell get on. Having destroyed the proper Parliament, it was impossible to get sham ones to work satisfactorily.

Thus the government fell into the hands of Cromwell; he had a Council of State to help him, and one of his constitutions had given him the title Cromwell a Despot. of Protector, but his real power rested on the Army. He could not afford to quarrel with it, and thus he refused to take the title of king, because the Army hated the idea of a king. The result was that Cromwell, having taken arms for a Parliament against a despotic king, became himself in the end more despotic than ever Charles I. had been. He ruled without Parliament; he took taxes without Parliament; his major-generals, who governed various parts of Britain, were more absolute than Strafford himself at the height of his power.

England had become a military state. It had overthrown Ireland and Scotland. It made war on the Dutch Republic. Blake and Monk, both by profession soldiers, soon proved themselves excellent sailors. The Dutch fleets were defeated, and the Dutch forced to beg for peace. Cromwell wished to put himself at the head of a great League of Protestants in Europe, and he allied himself with France, because France though Catholic was a bitter enemy of Spain. English fleets took Jamaica, and captured Spanish treasure-galleons as they had done in Elizabeth's reign. Cromwell's death, however, put an end to these ambitious schemes.

He left his power to his son Richard, but Richard was not a soldier, and the Army would not obey him. In a short time it appeared that the Army would obey no one; the "Rump" was recalled, and again expelled. Everyone hated the Army, but no one could suggest a means of getting rid of it.
Death of Cromwell; Disunion in the Army.

Fortunately the Army was not united. Monk marched southwards from Scotland with his men; Lambert at the head of another section of Ironsides tried to stand against him and failed. Monk reached London, and to everyone's joy declared for a free Parliament. This meant the recall of Charles II., for all alike, Cavaliers and Parliamentarians, had grown united in their hatred of the Army, and were ready to welcome back a lawful king. The Convention Parliament, which Monk and the Restoration.

Monk caused to be summoned, immediately invited the king back. On his way towards London he passed at Blackheath the real masters of England, a sullen and mutinous mass of soldiery; but they could find no leader, their day was past.

XXV.—FROM THE RESTORATION TO THE REVOLUTION.

To understand the reigns of Charles I.'s two sons, Charles II. and James II., we must bear in mind the following main facts:—

1. Both kings are Roman Catholics: Charles a 1660-1689; secret Catholic and James an open one. Main Facts. Each tries to get liberty of worship for the Catholics, and if possible to restore Roman Catholicism in England.

2. The great majority of Englishmen are members of the National Church. Those who still cling to the Presbyterian form of Church government, together with the Independents and other small sects, begin to be known as "Dissenters". They are not allowed to meet for public worship, and are otherwise hardly dealt with by Parliament. To gain their support by offering them toleration is a principal object of both kings.

3. All Europe feels itself in danger from the growing power of France under Louis XIV. The leader of the Grand Alliance against France is Charles II.'s nephew, William of Orange, who wishes to get Britain on his side. On the other hand, Louis XIV. tries to get Britain as his ally, or, if he cannot manage that, to keep Britain so distracted with quarrels at home that it cannot interfere against him. Further, it is easy for Louis XIV. to exercise influence with our kings, because both Charles and James are his cousins.

4. Parliament begins by supporting the king; but, as he favours the Catholics, it turns against him. It would like to see him fight for William of Orange against France, but does not dare to trust him with a standing army. Everyone remembered what Cromwell's army had done.

5. The Church supports the Crown more steadily than Parliament. It fears the Puritan party, and therefore teaches that resistance to a king is sinful. It is not till James II. makes an open attack on Protestantism that the Church wavers in its friendship for the Royal power.

We may now go on to remark some of the chief events in the course of this second struggle between Crown and Parliament, which ended, as the first had done, in the overthrow of a king.

Charles II. was wiser than his father. At bottom he was resolved to do nothing that should, to use his own words, "make him go on his travels again". He was also in a stronger position, because Parliament, in the first enthusiasm of the Restoration, had voted him a revenue for life. Indeed the Parliament that was elected in 1661 was so warmly Royalist that it was called the "Cavalier" Parliament. Charles knew that he would never get another which would be so friendly, so he kept it sitting for eighteen years, and by bribing some members and making friends of others, could generally make it do what he wished. Thus, whereas up to 1640 men had grumbled because Parliaments sat too little, now they complained that the same Parliament sat too long.

Charles II.,
1660-1685.

Charles's first minister was Clarendon, a strong friend of the Church of England. He persecuted the Dissenters; he made laws against conventicles, and forbade those who would not conform and the deprived Puritan clergy to hold any office, to teach, or to come within five miles of a town. The end of his ministry was disastrous. First came the Great Plague in

The Plague, London. So fast did the people die that 1665.

huge plague-pits had to be dug to bury the dead in, hundreds together. All who could fled from London, grass grew in the streets, rows of houses were shut up, and the red cross marked on the doors showed that the plague was within them. In the next year came the Great Fire, which burned St. Paul's, eighty-eight churches, and two-thirds of London. Perhaps even worse was the day when, for the only time in the history of England, the roar of enemy's cannon was heard in the city. Charles had neglected the fleet; he had spent the money upon his own pleasures instead. 1667.

The Dutch

A Dutch fleet sailed up the Thames, burnt the shipping at Chatham, and, had it dared, might have bombarded the capital. Never since has our naval renown been so low. The Dutch admiral hoisted a broom at his mast-head to signify that he had swept the English fleet from the sea.

Clarendon was disgraced. Charles's new ministry was called the Cabal, a term which denotes an inner council of ministers. The two chief men in it were Roman Catholics. Here we have a step onward in Charles's plot to restore Catholicism. He made the Treaty of Dover with Louis XIV., by which Louis promised money and an army. Then Charles issued a Declaration of Indulgence, which did away with the penal laws against both Catholics and Dissenters. He hoped that the latter would be so pleased to get freedom of worship that they would not mind the same relief being given to the Roman Catholics.

The Cabal and the Declaration of Indulgence.

Charles was wrong; the Dissenters did not love the Church of England, but they feared Catholics much more. The Declaration united all Protestants against the king. Parliament declared it to be grossly illegal, since it was a law made without their consent. To lull the storm Charles withdrew the declaration.

Still Parliament and the Protestants were not satisfied. They passed the Test Act, by which everyone holding office under the Crown was to take the sacrament according to the rites of the English Church. They pressed on a marriage between James's daughter Mary and William of Orange. The Test Act.

Charles agreed to this to stay the hostile feeling against the Catholics, but in vain. Suddenly an idea sprang up that the Catholics were actually plotting against English liberty and the Church. The "Popish Plot". A wretch named Titus Oates swore that he had found out such a plot. He told his story to a London magistrate, and soon after this man's dead body was found in a ditch. Everyone believed he had been murdered by the Catholics. Men thought the days of the Gunpowder Plot were coming again. Oates's lies were taken as a proof against any Catholic. Other informers rivalled him in inventing stories. No jury would accept a Catholic's evidence; in the eyes of men at that time every Jesuit was an open traitor, every Catholic a conspirator in disguise. Many innocent men were put to death. Even the House of Lords condemned Lord Stafford, old, respected, and absolutely guiltless, and had him executed.

Nothing would satisfy the Whig or "country" party in their panic. Urged on by Shaftesbury, they tried to exclude James from succeeding to the crown. Failure of the Exclusion Bill. But here Charles checkmated them. He dissolved Parliament, so that the Exclusion Bill could not be passed, and for the rest of his reign ruled without a Parliament, getting money from Louis XIV. Most men were tired of the violence of the Whigs, who seemed ready to renew the civil war, and were not sorry when the king drove Shaftesbury from the kingdom, and punished many of his most reckless followers.

Thus Charles II. had neither failed altogether nor had he been altogether successful. He had indeed staved off the attack on his brother, but he had not obtained liberties for Catholics. He had tried, and when he saw it was hopeless he had wisely drawn back. He was not a man to push things to extremes.

James II. was more headstrong than his brother. James II., 1685-1689. He was openly a Catholic. He meant to rule as an absolute king, and have his own way in matters of religion.

An event in the beginning of his reign might have warned him of his danger. The Duke of Monmouth, Monmouth Rebellion. an illegitimate son of Charles II., landed in Dorsetshire, and put himself at the head of a Protestant rebellion. Numbers of western peasants joined him. He planned a night attack on the Royalist forces sent against him. To reach them he had to march over a portion of Sedgemoor, which is cut by deep ditches. Three of these were safely crossed, but just as he neared the Royalists, a fourth ditch, of which he did not know, was found yawning in front of his men. In the confusion a pistol went off. The Royalist troops were roused, and poured a fire into their helpless enemy. Monmouth's men fought bravely, but as many were only armed with scythes and pikes, they could do little. The artillery and cavalry were brought up to complete the rout. Monmouth was captured soon after, and beheaded.

A terrible vengeance was taken on his followers. Five judges were sent into the west, headed by Jeffreys. Jeffreys was brutal and overbearing. He acted more like an accuser than a judge. He abused and insulted all the prisoners, and bullied juries into condemning them. More than 300 rebels were hanged, 800 more transported to the West Indies, and large numbers flogged, imprisoned, and fined. One poor woman named Alice Lisle was beheaded merely because two rebels had taken shelter in her house. Rightly was the name "the Bloody Assize" given to this circuit.

Encouraged by the ease with which Monmouth had been overcome, James went on his way. He began to collect a standing army, mainly composed of Irish Catholics, who were hated in England. Not content with this, James even made the Church hostile by thrusting Catholic priests into college offices at Oxford, and he imitated Charles by issuing a second Declaration of Indulgence, and ordering the clergy to read it from their pulpits. When seven bishops petitioned against this, James had them brought to trial, and strove in every way to get them condemned. But though the judges had been appointed by the king, and though the jury felt that they would in all likelihood be punished if they said "Not guilty", yet it was impossible to say that the bishops had committed any crime. So, to the great joy of England, they were acquitted.

The Bloody Assize.

Trial of the Seven Bishops.

The one thing that had made men bear with James so far was that he had no son, and his heiress, Mary, was a Protestant, and married to the Protestant champion in Europe, William of Orange. It was thought that when James died all would be right again. Just at this time, however, James had a son. Men saw that this son would be bred a Catholic like his father, and that the only way to get rid of them was to turn James off the throne.

Thus an invitation was sent by many of the chief nobles to William of Orange, asking him to come to England. He was only too glad. He landed with an army in Devonshire. It soon became clear not only that he would win, but that he would win without fighting a battle. James's ministers, generals, and soldiers deserted him wholesale. At last William drew near London. James was at one time in his hands, but William did not wish to keep him a prisoner; on the contrary, he desired to be rid of him; he made it easy for him to escape, and James fled to France. Then a Parliament was summoned which declared William and Mary King and Queen of England, and the Scottish Parliament did the same thing.

XXVI.—WILLIAM III. IN BRITAIN

Nothing shows more clearly how completely James II. had lost the affection of his English subjects than the ease with which William overthrew him. The Cavalier party in England, that had fought four bloody campaigns for his father, let James go without a blow on his behalf. In 1689-1702.

William and Mary,

Scotland and Ireland, however, there was more resistance.

The persecution of Nonconformists had fallen with special bitterness on the Scottish Covenanters. Charles had set up bishops again, had turned the Presbyterian ministers out of their churches, and had employed soldiers to punish all those who attended conventicles, as the open-air meetings were called in which the Covenanters gathered to worship in the way of their fathers. Men, and even women, had been imprisoned and shot down; others, who were rash enough to rebel, were brought before the Council, tortured with the thumb-screw and the boot, and at last hanged—"sent to glorify God in the Grassmarket", as Lauderdale brutally put it. Cruelty only led to violence. Sharpe, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, was murdered before his daughter's eyes by a party of desperate men. A rebellion had followed in the west. The Covenanters had beaten off the royal horse at Drumclog, but had been scattered themselves at Bothwell Bridge. None of the king's officers had been so stern towards the rebels, and none in consequence was so bitterly detested by them, as John Graham of Claverhouse, who was created Viscount Dundee.

It was to Dundee that James gave over his power in Scotland. Dundee saw that in the Lowlands nothing could be done for the house of Stuart, but, since William was known to be friendly to Argyll, he thought that the rest of the clans, who hated the Campbells, would rise for King James. He soon was at the head of an army of clansmen. He fell on the Williamite leader, Mackay, at the head of the Pass of Killiecrankie. Mackay's men fired a volley, which failed to check the

Persecution in Scotland.

Dundee slain
at Killiecrankie, 1689.

charge of the Highlanders. While they were fumbling with their clumsy bayonets, which then fitted into the barrel of the musket, the enemy was amongst them. Horse and foot were swept away together: Mackay's force seemed annihilated. Yet in the moment of victory James's cause was lost. Claverhouse—at whom the Covenanters had so often fired silver bullets, muttered prayers that the precious metal would overcome the powers of darkness which they believed to watch over him—lay dying, shot through the breast. Their leader gone, the strength of the Highlanders passed away; the army that had routed Mackay was driven off from Dunkeld by a handful of western Cameronians, and soon after dispersed.

Trouble was over for the time. Unfortunately the deep-seated cause of it, the hatred between the Campbells and the Macdonalds, was only made more bitter by the treacherous massacre of the Macdonalds of Glencoe, the work of Campbells from Argyll's own regiment. It is said that William did not know what was intended, but Dalrymple's order, "it will be a proper vindication of justice to extirpate that set of thieves" bears William's own signature, so the king cannot be pronounced guiltless of what was done.

The Highlands took up the Jacobite cause because the Campbells were Williamite. In Ireland the motive was different. The Irish Catholics fought for a king of their own religion because they hoped to make him restore to them all the land that had been forfeited for rebellion and given to Protestant settlers. At first all Ireland was in James's hands, save only the towns of Londonderry and Enniskillen, in which the Protestants, many of them Scottish Presbyterians, held out stoutly. Londonderry was besieged for 105 days; the defenders were reduced to gnaw hides to keep life in their bodies; a dog's paw was sold for 5s. At length William's ships broke through the boom placed to block the river Foyle, and relieved the town. In the next year William took over an army, and beat James at the battle of the Boyne. James's troops were mostly Irish, who then were far from showing the bravery they have shown since. It was said that "their usual way of fighting was to discharge their pieces once, and then to run away, bawling 'Quarter!' and 'Murder!'" James, however, was not much braver. After the battle he was the first to reach Dublin. He told Lady Tyrconnel, "Your countrymen have run away", and received the stinging answer, "If they have, Sire, your Majesty seems to have won the race". Although James himself gave up in despair, and went to France, the Irish continued to resist, fighting far more stoutly than they had done at the Boyne. The last struggle was at Limerick, where a treaty was made by which William was accepted as king. It was further agreed that the Catholics should enjoy the same liberties as in the reign of Charles II., but this part of the treaty was not kept.

Sieve of Londonderry, 1689.

Battle of the Boyne, 1690.

Treaty of Limerick, 1691.

The Irish Parliament insisted on persecuting the Catholics, and by doing so increased the national hatred to the English rule. In fact the hostility caused by the breach of this treaty has lasted to our own day.

William was now master of all James's dominions. He used his power wisely and moderately. He would not punish men for their opinions, or for what they had done for James. On one occasion he was given a list of those who were plotting against him. He put it in the fire without reading it. Britain indeed might be thankful for so generous-minded a king.

The overthrow of James settled the question between King and Parliament for ever. All the claims of Parliament were summed up in the Supremacy of Parliament. Bill of Rights, which pronounced it illegal for the king to "dispense with" or set aside the laws, to levy money, or to keep a standing army in time of peace, without leave of Parliament. Further, it was declared that Parliament was to be freely elected, and should have liberty to debate about anything it pleased; and, finally, that no Catholic could be king. Henceforward power was in the hands of Parliament. Although William wished to take his ministers from both the Tory and Whig parties, yet in a short time it was recognized that those ministers should have the power whose followers were in a majority in the Commons. Thus we have the beginnings of our modern system of party government; but, as we shall see, a long time was to pass before the system was perfected.

XXVII.—WAR WITH FRANCE. MARLBOROUGH.

The accession of William III. was followed at once by a war with France, which lasted eight years. Nor does this war stand alone; it is the fore-runner of many others. Indeed, if we take a general view of the 126 years that lie between the accession of William and the battle of Waterloo we shall find that war goes

Beginning of a New Hundred Years' War with France, 1689-1815.

on almost exactly half the time. There are seven wars, which, when added together, take up rather more than sixty years. In the eighteenth century war with France is almost the rule. But if, instead of going 126 years onward from 1688, we look back over the same length of time—that is to say, roughly speaking, to the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, we find quite a different state of affairs. War with France is the exception; in the earlier period there are only two wars with France, lasting three years. It seems very curious that for a century and a quarter we have only three years of war with France, and then for the next century and a quarter we have sixty years of fighting. Why was this so? Why did the wars begin with William III.?

The lapse of time enables us to give an answer to the first question, which would hardly have been accepted in William's or Anne's day, and yet was true. Britain was entering upon a second Hundred Years' War with France, not this time for territory in France, but for colonial power. The question really was whether the New World and India should fall into French or British hands. But this only came in sight by degrees; it is hardly visible in William's day; it is not conspicuous in Anne's reign; but fifty years later, when a war between Britain and France led to fighting all over the world, it is obvious.

The fact is that William and his English subjects were both at war with France, but for different reasons. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that William's whole life is summed up in enmity to France. France was the leader of the Catholic opposition to Protestantism; she was threatening all Europe by her growing power; espe-

The War
Colonial in Character.

Growing Power of France.

cially was she dangerous to William's native country, Holland. She became, as it were, a big bully, to whom might alone is right. And just at this time a fresh danger appeared. It seemed likely that France would be united with Spain, for Louis's grandson was heir to the Spanish throne. Such a union might give France all the wide Spanish possessions in the New World, and it would upset the balance of power in Europe altogether. William, therefore, set himself to check Louis XIV. by a grand Alliance; when Britain came under his sway he included Britain, as a matter of course, among the allies. It was, in fact, a master-stroke of his policy, for in the previous reigns it had seemed likely that the Catholic Stuarts would take the side of their Catholic cousin, Louis XIV.

Englishmen, however, did not take so wide a view. They made war against France because France helped James II. Louis had received him, and given him a palace and large sums of money, had called him King of England, and had sent his troops to fight on his behalf in Ireland. Britain, therefore, fought against Louis as a Jacobite, not against Louis as a danger to Europe.

This comes out clearly in William's war. It was not very popular, and it was not successful enough to William's War excite enthusiasm. William was always Unpopular. being defeated. It was true that he had generally fewer men, and that he was clever enough to prevent the French generals gaining much by their victories. Yet it was hard to feel proud of a war in which all that could be said was that William had done his best, and that the defeats had not turned out so disastrous as had been expected. In reality it was a great achievement for William to hold his ground

I am comen to the hill, on the hills the the sonales of Glencoe, and putt all to the ground under fidelity, you are to have a speciall word that the old the sonales of Glencoe, and putt all to the ground under fidelity, you are to have a speciall word that the old more afraid. This yet and to put in execution all type of the stock precisely, and that time renewed shortly after it, people of the with a stronger party. I have not come to the people are not to say for the time

This is by the King, shall you and the goods safety of the country, that the people are to off root and branch. I see that the people are land, that the people are to be, and the people are shall with is not to be, and the people are in a man, that the people are to be, and the people are sawbird. Expecting the people are to be, and the people are the people are to be, and the people are to be, and the people are the people are to be, and the people are to be, and the people are

After this will about of the

Robert Campbell
16th Nov 1746

Photo. Half-tones, Ltd.

REDUCED FACSIMILE OF THE ORDER THAT LED TO THE MASSACRE OF GLENCOE

(The original was sold in 1907 for £1450)

GENEALOGY OF THE STUARTS.

TABLE TO EXPLAIN THE SPANISH SUCCESSION.

at all. But this was not understood; so when Louis made peace at Ryswick, and admitted William's title to be King of England, his British subjects were satisfied that enough had been done. That they had no wish to carry on an eternal war with Louis was shown by the next step which Parliament took; it began to reduce the army, and sent away William's Dutch guards.

After the Treaty of Ryswick the great powers had agreed upon an elaborate division of the Louis Breaks his Promises. Spanish dominions by which the French claimant was to get little. Within three years Louis broke through the treaty, and accepted the whole inheritance of Spain for his grandson. William saw there was more urgent need for war than ever before. Parliament, however, would not listen to him. Had Louis been prudent it is likely that Britain would have remained neutral. But Louis took a false step. James II. died, and Louis recognized his son as James III., King of England.

This piece of impudent interference set everyone against him. On all sides war was demanded: it was necessary to avenge the insult, to teach Louis that he could not by his word make or unmake British kings. Thus the war which began in Anne's reign was very different from that of William. It was popular instead of unpopular; and beyond this, it was brilliantly successful instead of being dubious and indecisive; William never won a pitched battle against the French; Marlborough never lost one.

Much has been written against Marlborough, and with justice. He was greedy for money; he had played the traitor over and over again; Marlborough. he betrayed James II., who had been a good friend to him; he plotted to betray William III.;

he even kept up a correspondence with the Old Pretender while he was commander-in-chief of Anne's armies. One of the blackest deeds in the whole of our history stands against his name. Talmash was sent by William to surprise Brest. Marlborough was jealous of Talmash, and wished him to fail, so he was mean enough to let the French know of the intended attack. They received the English with a tremendous fire, and Talmash was killed.

Yet although Marlborough had some detestable points in his character, he was an admirable general. He was always good-tempered, and thus was able to manage the numerous allies, Dutch and Germans, who formed part of his army. He was cool, brave, wary, resolute. None knew better than he how to arrange his forces for an attack, or how to wield them in battle itself.

Marlborough's first great battle showed what a keen eye for war he possessed. He was commanding the English forces in the Low Countries; he was to protect Holland from a French invasion. But Marlborough knew that the right way to protect it was not by waiting in his lines till the French attacked him; the true course was to strike a great blow at the French wherever a chance appeared. In 1704 a French army was pushed forward down the valley of the Danube, threatening Vienna. Marlborough saw that by marching southward at once he could come down on the French flank, and force it to give up the attack on Vienna. But the march was long: it had to be done speedily and quietly, so as not to give the French warning of what was intended. The Dutch, too, were much alarmed lest they should be attacked by the French while Marlborough was away. Marlborough overcame all these difficulties. He met the French under Tallard at Blenheim, on the banks of the Danube. The battle was long doubtful, until a great charge of the English cavalry, led by Marlborough himself, at last broke the French centre. The French army was cut in two, and the right wing, hemmed in with the Danube at its back, was forced to surrender. Marlborough wrote to his wife: "The army has won a glorious victory. M. Tallard and two other generals are in my coach, and I am following the rest."

Battle of Blenheim,
1704.

Europe could scarcely believe that the French troops, so long believed invincible, had been routed in this way. It seemed to be an accident. But in the course of the next five years Marlborough showed that it was no accident. He beat the French in three great battles in the Low Countries—Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. He took all the French fortresses; he even made ready to invade France itself.

Meanwhile, however, England was growing tired of the war. Marlborough had at first been supported by the queen, since Marlborough's wife was the queen's closest friend. But the duchess had a violent, domineering temper, and by degrees Anne took a dislike to her. She made friends instead with a Mrs. Masham, who was in the hands of the Tory party, and the Tory party were anxious for peace. Treaty of Utrecht, 1713. At length Marlborough was recalled, and peace was made at Utrecht. The French king promised to leave off supporting the Pretender, and Britain gained Gibraltar, Minorca, Nova Scotia, and St. Kitts, and also the right of shipping slaves to the Spanish colonies.

We remember that the war was begun to keep Louis's grandson, Philip, off the throne of Spain; this object was not attained. Philip became king there to the North-East under

THE FRENCH FRONTIER

LOUIS XIV

showing William III and Marlbrough's campaigns.

The French Frontier shown thus: - as Philip V. But Britain had ceased to care about this. Her real aims were now plainly colonial and commercial. We can see this by the gains which she took under the treaty; two ports in the Mediterranean, two colonies in the New World, and a trading privilege that brought much wealth.

XXVIII.—THE UNION OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

Ever since James VI. of Scotland had become James I. of England, it was only too plain that great difficulties might arise from the fact that England and Scotland. England and Scotland were very loosely joined. Hitherto the two kingdoms had agreed in the main to accept the same sovereign, although, as we have seen, Scotland at one time set up Charles II., while England had a Commonwealth. Both had agreed to obey William and Mary, and after them Anne. Beyond this, agreement ended. The English Parliament chose, as the next heir after Anne, the Electress Sophia, a Protestant, and a granddaughter of James I. It was not, however, certain that the Scots would accept this. Supposing they were to choose someone else, the kingdoms would be again divided.

In the beginning of Anne's reign it seemed quite possible that Scotland would insist on breaking up Discontent in Scotland. the union of the crowns. The whole nation was in a discontented state. The Jacobites hoped to put James II.'s son, the Old Pretender, on the throne; the Presbyterians feared that the queen might be tempted to overthrow the establishment of the Presbyterian Church which William III. had promised to maintain; and everyone was furious about the failure of the Darien Scheme.

This Darien Scheme was the invention of a Scot named William Paterson. He had been the founder of the Bank of England. In 1695 he came forward with a proposal that the Scots should form a trading company like the English East India Company, which had been so successful, The Darien Scheme. and plant a colony on the Isthmus of Darien. He hoped that by taking up a position there, where only a narrow strip of land separates the Atlantic from the Pacific, the colony would attract traders from all quarters and soon grow wealthy. He spoke of a fertile soil, and held out hopes of great riches, both from commerce and the search for gold; soon all Scotland grew red-hot over his plan. Everyone who had money hastened to take shares in the company. It is said that nearly one-half of the wealth in the country was invested in it. In 1698 five ships set sail from Leith carrying 1200 colonists, all sure that they were setting out to make their fortunes.

Their hopes were doomed to bitter disappointment. When the colonists got to Darien, they found the climate unhealthy and ill-suited for white men to live in. And besides, both English and Spanish Jealousy. England and Spain were hostile to them. The English were jealous for their own trade. They wished to keep all commerce with English colonies in English hands; if anyone else was prosperous they thought it was at England's expense; they strove more anxiously to destroy a rival's trade than to extend their own. So orders were sent to the English colonial governors to refuse even food to the Darien colonists. The Spaniards claimed that the Isthmus of Darien was Spanish territory, and sent soldiers to eject the Scots. Thus all the Scottish plans came to nothing; the first colonists were starved out, and a second expedition, after gallantly defeating one force of Spaniards, had to surrender to superior numbers. The luckless New Failure. St. Andrews, which the colonists had built, was abandoned to moulder into decay, a collection of ruined and fire-scorched huts, a burying-ground of innumerable Scottish hopes. Only a few survivors, broken by fever and famine, returned home. All the money was lost. Hundreds of families were ruined.

The plan may have been rash, but the jealousy of the English government and merchants took away whatever chance it had. It is little wonder that the Scots were furious. That the Spaniards should behave as foes they could understand; but that Englishmen should refuse bread to starving colonists who were under the same king and spoke the same tongue, was inhuman. So when Anne begged the Scottish Parliament to settle who should succeed to the throne

Act of Security. after her, the Scottish Parliament replied by passing the Act of Security, which laid down that no king of England was to be chosen to rule in Scotland unless he would guarantee that for the future Scotsmen should have the same liberties to trade as England enjoyed.

This caused much anger in England. An act was passed that if the succession was not speedily settled Scotsmen were to be treated as foreigners, that no Scottish goods were to be admitted into England, and that Carlisle, Newcastle, Berwick, and Hull were to be fortified. Troops gathered in the north. It seemed as if war might break out, and Bannockburn and Flodden be fought over again.

Happily there were wise heads on each side, and they kept cool. Anne's adviser, Godolphin, was ready to give way over the questions of commerce if Scotland would consent to a union. Accordingly an equal number of English and Scottish commissioners were appointed, and in less than four months they came to terms. Of these the chief were—

1. That for the future the two countries were to form one realm, Great Britain, with one Parliament sitting at Westminster, and containing forty-five Scottish members in the Commons and sixteen Scottish peers in the Lords.

2. That the Scottish Presbyterian Church and the system of Scottish law were to remain intact.

3. That Scotsmen were to have the same liberties to trade within England, and with English colonies and foreign nations, as Englishmen had.

4. That a sum of money should be paid over to Scotland to be applied to pay off the Scottish National Debt, and relieve those who had lost by the Darien disaster.

It was doubtful for some time whether these terms would be accepted by the Scots. Parliament was on the whole friendly, but the people hated the idea of a union. They thought that their nation was selling itself, and that, whatever England might promise, the Scottish Church and institutions would be in danger. Lord Belhaven bewailed, in a mournful speech, what he took to be the ruin of Scotland. He likened Caledonia's fate to that of Cæsar; he spoke of her sitting helpless, awaiting the fatal stab that would end her life, dealt by her own children.

The Duke of Hamilton and the Jacobites threatened a rising; Edinburgh was in an uproar; the Cameronians of the West were ready to take arms at the call of their ministers. Still, Parliament went steadily on, and at length the treaty was passed.

On May 1st, 1707, the Union took place. All the prophecies of evil turned out to be false. The best answer to Lord Belhaven's gloomy forebodings was that made by Lord Marchmont, "I awoke, and behold it was a dream". Nowadays no one doubts that the Union was wise. It found Scotland a poor country; it enabled her to become a rich one. Scottish enterprise has seized the opportunities that were opened to her; her trade and industry have grown gigantic; her manufactures are found all over the world. Thanks to the excellent system of national education, in which, at the time of the Union, Scotland was far in advance of England, Scotsmen were well able to use the chances that were given them. There is, however, much more than a mere gain in wealth. If before the Union each kingdom had reason to be proud of its national histories, they can now glory every whit as much in the later history of the joint realm of Great Britain. Each had found the other a sturdy foe; since they had agreed to take the same side for ever, both have been the gainers, and the valour displayed at Cambuskenneth, Falkirk, Bannockburn, Flodden, has been more happily employed shoulder to shoulder in the Peninsula, at Waterloo, in the Crimea, in India, for the building up of our great empire.

XXIX.—THE "FIFTEEN" AND THE "FORTY-FIVE".

In spite of the Act of Settlement which had declared the house of Hanover to be heirs to the throne, the last few months of Anne's reign were ^{George I.,} months of great excitement and uncertainty. 1714-1727. Bolingbroke was at the head of affairs; he was known to have plotted deeply with the Jacobites and to favour the Pretender. But Anne died before his schemes were ready, and George I. became king without resistance.

The Jacobites were bitterly disappointed. Anne they had accepted since she was a Stuart, but George I. had very little Stuart blood in him, and indeed was so much a foreigner that he could scarcely speak English. They began at once to meditate rebellion.

The Highlands was clearly the most promising place to begin. Thither the Earl of Mar went, and under pretence of a grand hunting- ^{The "Fifteen",} party, assembled the chiefs of most of 1715.

the clans and appointed a day for gathering. Mar found the Highlanders as ready as ever to fight, but he himself was no general. He occupied Perth, but he lay there for months doing nothing instead of falling on the royal army under Argyll, which was far smaller than his. The only move he made was to send a division of Highlanders under MacIntosh across the Forth. These threatened Edinburgh, but failed to take it. Then they marched southward and joined a small body of rebels raised by Forster on the border, and Kenmure from Dumfriesshire. After much doubt this handful, numbering at most 3000 men, some even without swords, resolved to invade England. They met with no support. No one would join a cause that looked so hopeless. They ^{Rising in} reached Preston, but were there surrounded by the king's forces under Carpenter and Willis. With the courage of despair they beat off the first attack, but as the town was burning around them they were driven to surrender.

This was an utter failure, but it becomes almost glorious when we compare it with the contemptible doings of Mar. With 10,000 men, a far larger force than ever Montrose handled, he at last made up his mind to move against Argyll. The armies met at ^{Battle of} Sheriffmuir. Seeing that Mar had ^{Sheriffmuir, 1715.} three to one, and further, that his Highlanders were better for a charge than even regular soldiers of the day, Argyll should have been swept away with ease. The Highlanders outflanked his left wing, broke it and chased it off the field; but on the right Argyll's men stood firm, while a small body of horse, crossing a marsh which was hard frozen, charged the Camerons and Stewarts on the flank and overthrew them. The battle now was in a curious state: each right wing was victorious. Mar's men, however, did not risk another attack, and the battle was left drawn. Still, all the fruits of victory were with Argyll. Nothing but success could have saved Mar, and with everything in his favour he had failed. Well might a clansman say as he watched the undecided fight, "O for one hour of Dundee".

The cause was lost. At the moment when it had become hopeless, the Pretender, James Edward, reached Scotland. It was mere mockery for him to call himself King James III. Mar's army was melting away daily, while King George's troops were being reinforced. Nothing was left for James but to leave the country again without striking a blow. Mar went with him, deserting his army. If he had not done so, his army would speedily have deserted him.

"The 'Fifteen", as this rising was called, was a model of hopeless mismanagement. No one had any plans; no one seems ever to have really believed that it would succeed. Alone among Highland rebellions it has nothing notable about it. The Highlanders could generally be trusted to win a battle, to do some valiant deed; but the wavering of the leaders must have been shared by the clansmen. The muddle at Sheriffmuir was a fit ending to the whole enterprise.

Thirty years were to pass before the Jacobites made another serious attempt. In these years the Hanoverian kings had strengthened their hold on the nation. Men were much less inclined to upset a government that had lasted thirty years than one that was new on the throne. Sir Robert Walpole had given the country years of good and peaceful rule. He had pleased the Scots by bestowing the chief offices in Scotland on Scotsmen. The dislike of the Union was passing away, as its benefits became more apparent. Further, Marshal Wade, who had been sent to command in Scotland after the "'Fifteen", had done much to quiet the Highlands by capturing arms, building forts, and making good roads through the mountains. Yet, in spite of all this, when the "'Forty-five" came, it was far more serious than the "'Fifteen", for the reason that it had a real leader.

One thing that had added to the hopelessness of Mar's rising was that Britain and France were at peace, and thus the Old Pretender could not get any help from the French power. In 1739, however, Britain went to war with Spain, and as Spain and France were allied, this soon led to a war with France. Thus the Pretender's son, Charles Edward,—the Young Pretender, as the Hanoverians called him, Bonnie Prince Charlie of the Highlands,—was encouraged to try once again to set up the House of Stuart. As it turned out he got no real aid from France; but he expected it, and this hope first led him to seek the Scottish shore.

Prince Charles was young, pleasant in manner, good-looking, and energetic—a very different man from his father. Although the Highland chiefs were not at first willing to rise, some of them could not resist the prince's prayers. Cameron of Lochiel did not wish to join; he would not listen to any arguments. "Then", said Charles, "let Lochiel, whom my father esteemed the best friend of our family, remain at home and learn from the newspapers the fate of his prince." "Not so," answered Lochiel, "I will go with you, and so shall everyone with whom I have influence." Soon a body of clansmen assembled, devoted to the young prince, who marched on foot as one of themselves. Sir John Cope started northward, intending to attack them, but finding the Highlanders holding the difficult pass of Corryarrick, went on his way towards Inverness. Charles promptly turned southwards. As he drew near Edinburgh the greatest alarm was felt in the town. There were no troops save two regiments of dragoons, so a body of volunteers were hastily enlisted; but when a march against the Highlanders was proposed the volunteers deserted by the score, flinging away their arms and darting down the wynds to escape. When the West Port was reached only forty-five men were still with the colours. These firmly refused to take one step outside the walls. As for the two dragoon regiments, they bolted without returning a shot, and began a mad flight which ended at North Berwick. The city itself was taken by a handful of fifty Camerons, who rushed in at the Netherbow as a coach was coming out.

Prince Charles
Edward, the
Young Pretender.

Seizes
Edinburgh.

Meanwhile Cope had brought his men back by sea to Dunbar, and was preparing an attack on the capital. Charles marched out to meet him. For the whole of one day the armies lay face to face at Prestonpans, separated by a morass which neither could cross in the face of the enemy. At nightfall, however, Prince Charles heard of a path by which he could lead his men round Cope's left. Silently in the darkness the Highlanders filed off. In Rout of Prestonpans. the misty daybreak they burst on Cope's forces, who had scarcely time to form a fresh front to meet them. It was Killiecrankie over again. The Highland claymores could not be resisted. The battle did not last ten minutes. The dragoons at once broke and fled in panic. Of the infantry hardly two hundred escaped. The rest were killed or taken prisoner.

So far Prince Charles had prospered. The next step was more doubtful. He made up his mind to March into England. march into England. Here, however, the weakness of a Highland army became clear. Nothing was easier than to lead Highland troops to victory; nothing more difficult than to keep them together for a campaign. In this Montrose had failed, and Dundee's men had dispersed after one check. It was not likely that Charles would be more successful.

For a long time luck seemed with him. He entered England, took Carlisle, marched south through Lancashire, and even got so far as Derby. There, little more than a hundred miles from London, his officers Retreat from Derby. forced him to turn back. Their little force of 5000 men was being hemmed in between the Duke of Cumberland and Marshal Wade, each with a larger army. Scarce an English recruit had joined them. "If the devil had come recruiting," said Perth, "they would have preferred him." The Highlanders fell back, beating off an attack of Cumberland's horse at Clifton, near Penrith. Since this, no fight has been fought on English soil.

Charles's chance, poor though it was, ended when

Photo. Rischgitz

WILLIAM PITT, THE GREAT COMMONER

From the portrait by R. Brompton in the National Portrait Gallery

he turned back at Derby; once again, however, he was to be mocked by fortune. He routed General Hawley's force at Falkirk, but was Falkirk. unable to turn the victory to account. He retired northwards, Cumberland, at the head of the royal forces, leisurely following.

Culloden Moor, some five miles from Inverness, was to see the Stuarts strike their last blow. In the hope of repeating the surprise of Preston- Culloden. pans, Lord George Murray was sent to lead a night attack on Cumberland's camp. The troops marched slowly; dawn was approaching when no more than two-thirds of the way had been travelled. Weary and hungry, the Highlanders had to march back to Culloden. By mid-day Cumberland was upon them with double their numbers. The clans on the right and in the centre, galled by a cannonade which they could not return, charged wildly on the royal forces. They received a volley at close quarters, but managed to break the first line. The second line gave them another volley, and turned them. Meanwhile, on the left, the MacDonalds, angered that the place of honour on the right had not been given to them, hung back. The battle was lost. The Highlanders fled. Cumberland's horse pursued the fugitives for miles, cutting down stragglers.

We need not dwell on the romantic story of Prince Charles's escape, nor on the brutal conduct of the royal forces towards the Highlanders, which earned for Cumberland the title of the Butcher. What we have to notice is the effect of the "'Fifteen" and the "'Forty-five". The double failure meant Destruction of the Jacobite Cause. the extinction of the Jacobite cause. Nothing came out so clearly in the march to Derby as the fact that the great mass of the people of England did not want the Stuarts back. Many indeed had been ready to drink "to the king over the water"; very few were willing to risk anything by fighting for him. The downfall of the Jacobite cause had also an important effect on British party politics. Throughout the reigns of George I. and George II. the Whigs remained in power, because all Tories were distrusted; they were suspected of being Jacobites, disloyal to the house of Hanover. The next reign, however, saw this altered. George III. took the Tories into favour, and kept them in their turn as his ministers for the greater part of his long reign.

Perhaps an even more important effect of the "Forty-five" was felt in the Highlands. Hitherto the Highlands had been a land apart Pacification of the Highlands. in Great Britain. Ordinary Scottish law hardly ruled there. The country was governed by chiefs who had, like the old feudal nobles, absolute power even of life and death over their clansmen. The Lowlanders on the Highland border had no love of their Highland neighbours who were given to "lifting" the cattle of the farmers, who had accordingly to be very watchful of their property. After the rebellion the Government strove to put an end to the authority of the chiefs over their clans. Their powers of judging their clansmen were taken away. The wearing of the tartan was forbidden. The Highlands came under the same law as the rest of Scotland. Finally, William Pitt hit on the happy idea of using Highland valour against the nation's enemies. He raised Highland regiments from the clans, set their chiefs to command them, and these soon became as valuable to George III. as they had been dangerous to George II. Thus by degrees the Highlands became modernized; robbery and cattle-lifting from lowland farms ceased; Highlander and Lowlander lived quietly side by side; and Scotland, as a whole, gained in peace and security.

XXX.—THE GROWTH OF THE EMPIRE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

WILLIAM PITT, THE GREAT COMMONER.

The middle of the eighteenth century was filled by three great wars, in which Britain took part. These are the wars of the Austrian Succession (1739-1748), the Seven Years' War (1756-1763), and the American War (1775-1783). On the other side there fought in the first war France, Spain, Prussia, Bavaria; in the second, France, Spain, Austria, Russia, Saxony; in the third, France, Spain, Holland, and our revolted American colonies. This variety of enemies seems to point to Britain's being unusually quarrelsome. What is the cause of this combativeness?

The answer is given by two facts. In the first place, the kings of Britain were also rulers of Hanover, and this possession entangled us in every war that went on in Germany. But the second is more important. We notice that France and Spain fought against us in all the wars. Here is the true explanation. Britain was really carrying on the long struggle with France which had begun with William III., the object of which was colonial. Spain was also a great colonial power, and became involved since she was the ally of France, having a king of the same Bourbon family. The other powers were drawn in also as allies of France,

The Wars of the Eighteenth Century.

A Prolonged Struggle against France.

which was engaged in great schemes of conquest in Europe. Thus Britain, to aid her plans of mastering the French in America and India, joined in against France in the European wars.

Thus, in following the story of the growth of the British empire during this time, we may neglect what happens on the Continent, in order to fix our eyes on what takes place at sea, or in America, or in India. These, and not the battlefields of Germany, are the real scenes of British interests. When in the Seven Years' War an English statesman sent money to our ally, Frederick of Prussia, saying, "I will conquer America in Germany", he meant that he would keep France's hands so full with wars in Europe that she would not have men or ships to be able to resist British troops in the New World or the Indies. This far-seeing man was William Pitt, the elder. Since

Pitt, the "Great
Commoner" his was the master-hand that did most at this time to make British policy colonial, and so to build up the British empire, it is well to see something of the man himself before we try to understand his work.

William Pitt first made a name for himself by his attacks on Walpole; but as he also took every chance of speaking against Hanover and the king's fondness for that country, King George II. hated him, and for a long time refused to have him as a minister. Pitt did not care. His first duty was to the people, not to the crown. The king dismissed him from office, but the country was determined to have him back again. They were right. "No one ever", it was said, "entered Pitt's room who did not come out of it a braver man." He was made Secretary of State in 1757, when the Seven Years' War was going against us everywhere. "I know I can save the country," he said proudly, "and no one else can." Pitt had a wonderful power of choosing the best admirals and generals; he saw at once what men were fit for; he never allowed rank or age to influence him; all he looked at was merit. Almost in an instant failure was changed into success. In 1757 Lord Chesterfield wrote: "I am sure that we are undone, both at home and abroad. We are no longer a nation"; but in 1759, so fast did the victories come one after another, that men called it the Annus Mirabilis, "the Wonderful Year", and Horace Walpole declared that it was needful to ask each day what the latest victory was, for fear of missing one. Pitt's administration only lasted four years, but no other has ever been so glorious. Everywhere men crowded to see the "Great Commoner", as he was called, and wondered at the stern face and haughty look of the man who had raised Britain to such greatness.

Remembering, then, that it was to Pitt that we mainly owe the determination to get the better of France in the task of making our empire, we may turn to see how the task was carried out. We shall have to see what was done (1) in India, (2) in America, (3) at sea.

I.—THE WINNING OF OUR INDIAN EMPIRE.

Our empire in India, like most of our possessions abroad, was founded by the enterprise of merchants. In Elizabeth's reign a charter had been ^{The East} granted to the East India Company, ^{India Company.} giving it the sole right to trade to India. It had sent ships, built trading stations called factories, and obtained leave from native rulers to traffic in their dominions; it had had many quarrels with Dutch traders and French traders, who also were building factories and striving to get all the trade into their own hands; but for the first hundred years of its existence it had no wish to acquire territory. No one dreamed of conquering India as a whole.

About this time, however, a great discovery was made. It was that natives, if trained on European methods and led by European officers, Dupleix and the Sepoys. made excellent soldiers. A Frenchman named Dupleix was the first to turn this to good account. He raised a large force of 'Sepoys', as these native soldiers were called, took Madras from the British, and threatened to drive us from Southern India. Besides this, he turned his arms against native princes, deposing those who favoured the British and putting friends of his own in their places.

Using Sepoys, however, was a game that two could play at. There was an Englishman in India who soon showed that he could beat Dupleix with his own weapons. This was a clerk in the Clive at Arcot. Company's service named Robert Clive. With a handful of 500 men he marched upon the town of Arcot. The defenders fled at the sight of his troops. He fortified himself there, and was at once besieged by Dupleix with 10,000 men. For fifty days his little force held out against every assault. So devoted were Clive's Sepoys to their British leader that when food ran short they offered to give their share of rice to the Europeans, saying that the water in which it was boiled would be enough for themselves. At last Dupleix retired in despair. This defence of Arcot saved the British power in the South of India.

New work was soon ready for Clive's hand. The Nabob of Bengal, Surajah Dowlah, had marched on Calcutta, taken prisoner all the Europeans, and thrust them into the dungeon since called the Black Hole of Calcutta. One hundred and forty-six were put in; but so fearful was the heat in the tiny space, and so terrible the struggle to get water from the guards at the window, that next morning only twenty-three came out alive. Clive's vengeance came swiftly. Battle of Plassey, 1757. He marched against Surajah Dowlah, and met him at Plassey. It was another example of how formidable Europeans and Sepoys could be to an untrained Asiatic host. The Nabob's men were 40,000 to Clive's 7000, but they were utterly beaten. The Nabob was dethroned, and a friend of the Company put in his place.

Clive did much for India besides winning battles; he prevented the Company's officials trading for themselves and taking bribes; he introduced a purer system of administration, under which the natives of India have by degrees come to recognize that a Briton's word is as good as anyone else's oath. But what is most remarkable about him is that he definitely started the Company on the policy of interfering among native princes in order to acquire territory.

In the ranks of Clive's army at Plassey had been one who was to carry Clive's policy much further. Warren Hastings. This was Warren Hastings. In 1773 the British Government began to think that our settlement in India which had led to so much fighting between us and the French, ought to be under the control of Parliament. So they appointed Warren Hastings to be the first governor-general. Hastings extended the authority of the Company in all directions. He waged war on the Mahrattas; he had a long struggle with Hyder Ali, who was threatening to destroy British power in the south, and at last overcame him. Even in the time of the disastrous American War, when Britain could send him no aid, he held his own stoutly against the French. He was not always scrupulous in the way he obtained money, and for this he was impeached when he came home. But after a trial, in which most of the great orators of the day spoke against him, he was acquitted.

The period of Clive and Hastings, then, saw the real establishment of British power in India. Before them, the Company was a body of traders, afraid of the native princes, bent on pleasing them in order to get liberties of trade, still terrified of their rivals, the French. After them, the power of the French had fallen in the dust, and the Company was now as powerful as any native ruler, with as wide territories and as large a revenue, and a better army. It was obvious that what had been done in Bengal and the Carnatic could be done again all over India. One by one native rulers would fall before the Company, and it by degrees would become master of the whole. This is what actually came to pass.

II.—THE RISE AND FALL OF OUR FIRST AMERICAN COLONIES.

The story of the beginning of our American colonies is like that of our Indian empire in one respect, namely, that the work was at first almost entirely that of private persons, or trading companies acting under a charter from the crown. In all else it was different. India was thickly peopled, and divided up under powerful native princes; the climate is unsuited to Europeans; European children cannot live there. In America, on the other hand, there were few inhabitants, the Redskins; these were savages, and although cruel and bloodthirsty they were not difficult to drive out; the climate was temperate and suited to white men. But everything had to be begun from the beginning. Land had to be cleared and cultivated, houses built, roads made, and settlers tempted over from the Old World.

The British colonies in America had been settled at different times with different objects. Virginia was the oldest, Georgia the youngest. The Foundations of the Colonies. New England States had been peopled by Puritans, the first founders of the colony, "the Pilgrim Fathers", having left England in James I.'s day in order to find a home where they could worship as they pleased. Indeed religious troubles had much to do with the foundations of the colonies. Maryland had given a shelter to Catholics, Pennsylvania was a refuge for the Quakers. All these were under governors appointed by the crown, but as a rule the British Government interfered with them very little.

Thus in George II.'s reign the eastern coast of what is now the United States was occupied by a set of British possessions. Westwards they were limited by the Alleghany Mountains; in the north the French held Canada. Far away in the south was another Rivalry of Britain and France in America. French post at the mouth of Mississippi. A grave question now arose: to which power was the interior of the continent to fall? The French began to build forts on the head-waters of the river Ohio, intending to shut in the British and claim the west for themselves. A British expedition was sent to take these forts, but, falling into an ambush, was routed near Fort Duquesne by the French and their Indian allies. This was in 1755.

One very striking thing about this battle, as well as the defence of Arcot (1751), is that it took place at a time when Britain and France were at peace with each other. Nothing shows more clearly the unceasing rivalry in colonial matters that was going on between the two nations. Peace only existed in Europe. In India and America the struggle went on steadily.

Pitt saw that a blow must be struck. He chose James Wolfe to strike it. Although Wolfe was but thirty-three, he had been nineteen years in the army, and had won the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1758 he aided General Amherst to take Louisburg from the French, strongly fortified as it was. The next year he sailed up the St. Lawrence to attack Quebec. The town lies between the rivers St. Lawrence and St. Charles. Precipices rise from the river banks to the Heights of Abraham behind it. A French general, Montcalm, was there to defend it with a large force. Men said Wolfe was mad to attack it. "I wish he would bite some of the other generals, ^{Wolfe takes} then," said old George II., who under-^{Quebec, 1759.} stood Wolfe's courage. For three months Wolfe could do nothing. At last, embarking his men in boats, he brought them under cover of night to where the precipices of the Heights of Abraham frown over the river. He had heard of a narrow dangerous path. Silently the men climbed it in the darkness. When day broke, Wolfe's army was drawn up for battle on the open ground at the top. Montcalm led out the French to drive Wolfe back into the river, but his men could not resist the charge of the British. In the moment of victory Wolfe himself was struck by three balls. He lived long enough to hear that the French were beaten. "God be praised!" he cried; "I shall die happy." Quebec surrendered. All Canada was taken from the French, and by the treaty of Paris in 1763 passed into British hands.

British power was now supreme in America; the next war, however, was to see most of it disappear. ^{Colonial} So long as the French held Canada our grew dissatisfied. They complained that Britain hampered their trade. This was true, for British commercial policy at this time thought it right to destroy any trade in the colonies which might rival a home industry. Thus the colonists were not allowed to manufacture iron goods—nails, knives, and such like—for fear they might injure British ironworkers; they might not make beaver hats, but had to send the beaver to England to be made up, and then had to buy British-made hats. Even colonial produce, such as sugar and tobacco, had to be sent straight to Britain, in order that the merchants at home might be able to buy cheap. These rules were part of what was called the Mercantile System, by which everything was to be sacrificed to keep British merchants and manufactures prosperous.
^{Discontent.} American colonists feared them too much to wish to cast off British rule, for to rebel against Britain would have meant falling into the hands of France. This check being removed, the colonists

The colonists thus felt that Britain gave them little, and took a great deal. So when a tax called the Stamp Act was laid on the colonies, men grew very angry. No one would use British goods: ships which brought British tea were boarded, and the tea-chests emptied into Boston harbour; and soon after a party of British troops was fired on.

Proposals to tax the Colonies,
1765 and 1767.

The war of American Independence lasted seven years. The British generals were bad; the troops that were sent from home were mostly Hessians hired from Germany; the country was so vast that as soon as rebellion seemed crushed in one place, it burst out afresh in another. At first the British won most of the battles, though they had to fight hard for them; but the colonists were determined not to give in, and they had a general, George Washington, who, even when his men were short of

War of American Independence,
1775-1783.

Washington.

arms and powder, shoeless and half starving, yet managed always to make head against the British. Help came to him against Britain from an old British foe. France saw a chance to revenge herself for the loss of Canada; she took the side of the colonists. Cornwallis, the British general, had entrenched himself at Yorktown, trusting to get supplies by sea; but a French fleet appeared, drove off the British ships Yorktown. and blockaded Cornwallis. Washington 1781. closed in round him on land. Cornwallis had at last to yield. This was a death-blow to British power. Soon after we were compelled to acknowledge the United States to be independent.

So went our first great colony. After the first bitterness of defeat was over, men took it surprisingly calmly. They thought it was natural; "colonies", it was said, "were like pears; they would fall when they were ripe". But we shall find that this view has proved false. Our American colonies were lost because they were governed on a bad principle; but we have learned by experience to manage colonies on a better plan, and now our colonies are more firmly joined to their mother country than they have ever been.

III.—BRITISH POWER AT SEA.

If now we turn to what was done at sea during these three wars, we find a mixture of success and failure. Many brilliant things were done. In Anson. 1740 Anson started with a squadron to attack the Spanish possessions in the Pacific. He imitated Drake's great exploits, attacking and plundering towns, seizing Spanish treasure-ships, and returned home after four years' absence, bringing with him a million and a quarter in treasure. In 1759 Hawke won perhaps the most daring battle ever fought by a British commander. The French fleet had drawn in for shelter into Quiberon Bay, on the western coast of France. The bay is full of rocks and shoals; a wild November gale was blowing; to add to other difficulties night had fallen. Hawke dashed in among the Frenchmen, and made short work of them. Most were taken, burnt, or driven on shore. Hawke only lost forty men. Our fleet gave another proof of its importance on the outbreak of war with Spain in 1762. Manilla and Havana were immediately taken from the Spaniards, and the Plate fleet captured, one ship carrying treasure worth £800,000.

On the other hand, there are some failures to set against these exploits. There were many indecisive actions; one in 1744 led to a number of accusations between the officers in command, and a court-martial, in which the admiral was dismissed from the service. A worse thing yet was to come. At the beginning of the Seven Years' War, Admiral Byng, being sent to relieve Minorca, met a French fleet stronger than his own. He fought it in a very half-hearted way, and retreated. Minorca was lost, and Byng was brought to trial for misconduct, and shot. Voltaire said, "In England they have shot one of their admirals in order to encourage the others". In the war of American Independence we have already seen how de Grasse's fleet cut off Cornwallis, and caused his surrender at Yorktown.

For the greater part of that war, indeed, the British navy was not at its best. It did not appear to be able to strike a hard blow: it could wound, but not kill. The French took many of our West Indian islands; for three years Gibraltar was besieged, and though Governor Eliott's defence of it never wavered, though he drove off every attack by showering red-hot shot on the enemy's ships and setting them on fire, yet the mere fact that French and Spanish fleets should be able to engage in such a siege almost uninterrupted, seems discreditable to the British navy. Clearly it had not the command of the sea which we expect it to have nowadays.

One fact may well serve as a lesson—that the war in which our sea-power wavers is the only war that turns out disastrous. France had much improved her navy, while ours had been allowed to stand still; the result was that, fighting with fleets superior in numbers, in tonnage, and in guns, our admirals often failed to do anything decisive.

At last, however, when Britain was in the depths of despair, when America was gone, and when most of our West Indian colonies had been taken, a man was found to finish the war with a victory. Rodney met the French fleet off Dominica, and shattered it; the French admiral, de Grasse, was captured on his own flagship, which was reckoned to be the finest ship afloat.

This battle enabled us to make a much better peace than we should otherwise have done, but it has another and a much greater importance. The naval battles of the day had been indecisive, because the idea had been to lay the British ships alongside the French in line. What usually happened was this. As the British fleet filed by the French, each vessel received the fire of every French vessel in turn, and generally got its rigging cut up. When at last the two fleets were in position, van to van, centre to centre, rear to rear, and the British admiral was hoping for a good battle of hard pounding, the French fleet would draw off. The British ships, with rigging cut about, could not pursue. Thus battles were indecisive. The British would boast that the French had run; the French, that the British were too much crippled to follow.

Photo. Symonds, Portsmouth

A RELIC OF TRAFALGAR: THE "VICTORY" IN PORTSMOUTH HARBOUR

(page 197)

Rodney, however, adopted a different plan. He broke through the French line, and laid all his ships on both sides of the rear of the French fleet, thus getting it between two fires, while the French van had no enemy to attack. Thus his battle was decisive, for a number of French ships were overpowered before their comrades could come to their assistance. It gave our admirals what they had long desired—a chance of making the slippery Frenchman stay and fight it out to the end—and in a real battle the British fleets always triumphed. This plan of attacking in column and breaking the enemy's line was to lead to great results in the next war. It was employed by Nelson at Trafalgar.

One other naval exploit remains to be noticed, the more striking since at the time people thought little Australia, or nothing of it. The same year which saw 1770. the beginning of Lord North's government that was destined to lose us our American colonies, saw Captain Cook take possession of Australia and New Zealand in the name of King George. No one then understood the value of Cook's discovery; no one imagined that on the shores of the great southern island there would arise cities rivalling those of America; no one dreamed of the gold of Victoria and West Australia, or the sheep-runs of New South Wales; no one realized that a fresh continent had been secured for the British race. These things were hidden in the future. Yet thus, while one dominion was being lost, another was silently and almost imperceptibly added to replace it.

XXXI.—THE FRENCH REVOLUTION AND NAPOLEON.

With two short intervals Britain was continuously at war with France from 1793 to 1815, and this war ended the prolonged struggle that had begun under William III. and Marlborough, and had gone on with little cessation all through the eighteenth century. It was by far the greatest of Britain's wars. Alike by sea and land Britain made war on a larger scale than she had ever done before, with more ships and more men. It cost far more than any previous war; for not only had Britain to pay for her own vast fleet and the armies that drove the French out of Spain and finally conquered Napoleon at Waterloo, but she also gave enormous sums to her allies who were struggling against Napoleon on the Continent. Thus, in the twenty-two years of the war the National Debt increased to almost four times its previous amount, and at the end stood at the gigantic figure of nine hundred million pounds. But if much was spent in lives and money, much was gained. Although Napoleon and his victorious armies successively entered every capital on the Continent except Constantinople, Britain alone defied him. And when the end of the war came it found Britain strained by the great efforts she had made, but not exhausted; unconquered and unconquerable; firmly established as the mistress of the sea and the one great colonial power.

Revolutionary and Napoleonic
Wars, 1793-1815.

National Debt.

In the course of the war five periods deserve special notice. These are (1) the events of the years 1797 and 1798; (2) the battle of Trafalgar in 1805; (3) the British invasion of Spain; (4) Napoleon's expedition to Russia in 1812; (5) the battle of Waterloo in 1815. Of these the first two are naval events; the last three military.

1. Britain began the war with France partly from commercial reasons, partly because her ally, Holland, Causes of the War. was attacked, and partly out of disgust at the violence of the Jacobin or extreme French revolutionary party. This feeling was soon deepened when the Jacobins caused their king, Louis XVI., and his wife, Marie Antoinette, to be put to death by the guillotine—actions which were little else than murders. But the French, though attacked on all sides, showed extraordinary vigour in driving out their enemies. They won battle after battle; they compelled Prussia and Austria to beg for peace; they had even made Spain and Holland join with them and give them the assistance of their fleets; and in 1797 Britain alone was left still fighting.

The year was a very black one, for in the spring of it our navy, on which we relied, mutinied. First at Spithead and then the Nore, the fleets lay idle, the Mutiny of the Navy. sailors declaring they would fight no more till their grievances were redressed. It is true that two months earlier Admiral Jervis, with fourteen ships of the line, had shattered a combined French and Spanish fleet of twenty-seven vessels. But St. Vincent, 1797. France had another maritime ally, Holland. The Dutch fleet had been held blockaded by Admiral Duncan. But when our fleets mutinied it did not seem that this blockade could be maintained. The Dutch might break out, join the French, seize the Channel, and a French army might be landed in England. Duncan managed to deceive the Dutch. He kept a frigate or two cruising in sight of land, making signals as if to a blockading fleet outside. The Dutch did not know that the blockading fleet was not there—that it really was lying mutinous and idle. But time was gained. The sailors' demands for better pay, better food, and better treatment were granted. The fleet again put to sea Camperdown. before the slow Dutch made a move. 1797.

When they came out Duncan defeated them at Camperdown.

Jervis's second in command at St. Vincent was the son of a Norfolk clergyman, Horatio Nelson. He was to show that he could do greater things yet for Britain. His chance soon came. In Nelson.

1798 Napoleon Bonaparte was sent with a French expedition to Egypt. The French fleet got safely to Egypt, but Nelson found it lying in Aboukir Bay, in a place where the French admiral judged it would be impossible to attack him with any chance of success, since he had placed his ships so near to a shoal that it seemed impossible for the British ships to get between him and the land. To Nelson, at the head of a fleet, nothing was impossible. By Battle of the a magnificent piece of seamanship some of Nile, 1798.

the British ships rounded the extremity of the French line, while the rest anchored on the other side, placing the French between two fires. In the evening the fight began. It raged all night. In the middle of the darkness the French flagship L'Orient burst into flames, and eventually blew up with all hands. When morning came all the French fleet save four had been taken or sunk. The French power in the Mediterranean was broken.

2. Trafalgar relieved us from a danger nearer home. When, after a year of uneasy peace, war broke out again in 1803, Napoleon gathered an army of 130,000 men at Boulogne, ready to invade England. Hosts of flat-bottomed boats were prepared to carry them across, and the troops were so constantly drilled at embarking that the task was only an affair of minutes. "Let us", said Napoleon, "but be masters of the Straits for six hours, and we shall be masters of the world." But those six hours' mastery he was never to gain.

France was not without ships; indeed, could she only mass her own with those of her ally, Spain, she would have had a formidable fleet; but the ships lay blockaded in many separate harbours—Toulon, Rochefort, Brest, Ferrol, Cadiz. Napoleon formed an ingenious plan. His admiral, Villeneuve, was to dash out of Toulon the first time a storm drove off the British blockading fleet, and sail for the West Indies. Nelson would be sure to follow. Villeneuve, however, was not to fight him; he was to give him the slip, hasten back across the Atlantic, set free the imprisoned French ships at Brest, and thus, with a united fleet, hurry to Boulogne and give Napoleon the command of the Channel. The first part of the plan succeeded. Villeneuve avoided Nelson, and, leaving him in the West Indies, returned to Europe. But on his way he had to fight a British fleet under Calder, and though he was not seriously defeated, he turned aside and put into Cadiz, where he was at once blockaded. Napoleon's chance of invading England was gone.

Nelson took care that he never had another. On the 21st of October, 1805, he met the allied French and Spanish fleet off Cape Trafalgar. As the British fleet drifted slowly down in two columns against the allied line, Nelson made that famous signal Trafalgar, that will always be remembered by all 1805.

English-speaking races: "England expects that every man will do his duty"—and nobly every man did it. The enemy's fleet was destroyed, but the victory was won at the cost of Nelson's life. He was struck on the quarter-deck of his flagship, the Victory, by a musket-ball from the French ship, the Redoutable, and died soon after. But his work was done. Never again during the war was the British command of the sea in danger; never again were we threatened with the horrors of a foreign invasion.

3. While our sailors had been winning so much renown, our soldiers had done very little. They did not lack bravery, but they were badly led, Wellington. or else sent to places where they could do no good. Their turn came when Wellington (Sir Arthur Wellesley, as he then was) went to command the British army in Portugal. He defeated one French marshal after another. He constructed Peninsular War, the lines of Torres Vedras, a fortified 1808-1813. camp from which French armies far larger than his could not expel him. Step by step he drove the French through Spain towards their own frontier. He showed that British soldiers, when well led, were better than any soldiers in the world, and that even the French, so long victorious, could not resist the men who advanced to storm the steep and shot-swept breaches in the great fortress of Ciudad Rodrigo with unloaded muskets. Picton's order had been, "No powder. We'll do this thing with cold iron." It was done.

In the course of five campaigns Wellington cleared Spain, and in the spring of 1814 Britain was in turn invading France.

4. The war in Spain, which Napoleon called "the Spanish ulcer", to such an extent did it eat away his power, was not the only disaster he had met. In 1812 he had led half a million of soldiers—his Grand Army—into Russia. The Russians retired before him, and he reached Moscow. There, to his surprise, the Russians did not ask for peace. He was forced to retreat over the same country which his army had laid waste in his advance. His men could find neither food nor shelter. The Russians followed on his traces, and gave his men no rest. The Cossack horsemen cut off the stragglers. Then came on the winter, with snow and bitter frosts, more deadly than Russian cannon, sharper and more pitiless than Cossack lances. The wretched French froze to death round their very campfires. Not one in ten of the army escaped. Napoleon's veterans were gone; and after another year's fighting in Germany he was driven by combined Russian, Austrian, and Prussian forces to retreat into France, and at last had to give up his throne.

5. He was sent to Elba, a small island in the Mediterranean, but early in 1815 he escaped to France. The army joined him again, and it was felt that such an enemy to the peace of Europe must be crushed, and this time for ever. England was nearest at hand, and Wellington was the man to do it. He was sent with an army into Belgium. Wellington had the aid of a Prussian army under Blücher. Napoleon's plan was to thrust his force between the British and the Prussians, and defeat each in turn. He began well by beating Blücher at Ligny, and advanced to attack Wellington. The two great generals had never met before. On the 18th of June, 1815, the armies were face to face at

Napoleon's
Russian Campaign.

The "Hundred Days".
Waterloo.

Waterloo, the French superior in numbers, while Wellington had many Belgian troops, on whom he could not rely. But he had promised Blücher to stand fast at Waterloo, while Blücher had sworn to come there to help him, and both generals were men of their word. All day the British troops stood steady under the rush of cavalry and the storm of French shot and shell—"the thin red line" that could not be broken. Charge after charge was beaten off, and still the French swarmed to the attack. In the afternoon the thunder of the Prussian guns was heard coming up on the left. Wellington gave the word to his own troops to advance in their turn, and the French were overthrown. Napoleon was conquered at last.

It has been said that "at Waterloo Britain fought for victory; at Trafalgar for existence". The fruits of these battles are what we now enjoy: a land still secure from invasion; a supremacy at sea; great wealth drawn from a world-wide commerce; and a colonial empire which no other power can rival.

XXXII.—THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION.

Perhaps the greatest feature in British history during the eighteenth century is one which is often passed over very lightly. We think of Wolfe's conquest of Quebec, and of Clive's deeds in India. These, indeed, meant the expansion of our empire abroad. But we must not lose sight of the sources of our power at home. The most astonishing mark of our history in the eighteenth century is the way in which Britain was able to pour out money. She did indeed saddle herself with a heavy load of debt—a load which would have crippled any other nation. Yet at the end of the century, when Napoleon had to be fought, the country was able to find still more money, not merely enough to pay our own large navy and army, but enough to keep Austrians, Prussians, and Russians in the field against him as well.

The secret of this is that during the eighteenth century Britain became the workshop of the world. We grew rich by our trade and industry. Napoleon was right when he saw that if he could cripple our trade he might conquer us. But our trade was too vast to be crushed by even Napoleon's resources.

At the beginning of the eighteenth century Britain was still chiefly an agricultural country. Her iron trade languished because men had not learned to use coal to work it, and the supply of charcoal from the forests was running short. The linen business was small, chiefly centred in Scotland and the north of Ireland. No true cottons were made, because British spinners could not spin a cotton yarn strong enough for use as warp. The woollen trade was old and fairly vigorous, though it was somewhat held back by the fact that it took several spinners to make enough yarn to keep one weaver at work. But the mechanism used in the trade had made little progress. The hand-wheel and the hand-loom had been in use for a long time without any improvement.

Curiously enough, the first in the long string of discoveries came, not in the lagging branch of spinning, but in weaving. This was Kay's invention of the flying shuttle, by which the weaver was spared the need of passing the shuttle from one hand to another through the

The Inventions;
the Flying Shuttle, 1733.

warp. By the new plan he could work twice as fast and weave cloth of double width. Hitherto one man could only weave cloth as wide as the space occupied by his outstretched arms.

This put the spinners even further behind. Soon, however, they made up the lost ground. Hargreaves Spinning, invented the spinning-jenny, Arkwright the 1764-1772. water-frame, and Crompton combined the principle of these two machines in the "mule". There soon was an abundance of yarn, and Arkwright's cotton-yarn was strong enough for use as warp. This began our gigantic cotton industry. Cheshire and Lancashire were soon busy with cotton-mills. In a short time cotton employed more people than its old rival, wool.

Machines had been made to spin: could they be made to weave? This question was soon answered The Power-loom. by a clergyman named Cartwright, who made the first power-loom. It was very clumsy, but he and others soon made improvements. By the beginning of this century the power-loom was fast driving the hand-loom out of the field.

Invention followed invention; it is impossible to notice them all. We may remark two more: the first, Bleaching and Colour-printing. the process of bleaching by chlorine perfected by a Scot, Tennant, which reduced the time required for bleaching from many weeks to a few days; the second, that of colour-printing by a revolving cylinder instead of a small hand block, which enabled one man to do the work of twenty. Inventions of this nature made it easy to turn out Victory of Machinery over Hand Work. goods much faster and cheaper than before.

Further, though most of these inventions were first made in cotton, they could be modified for use with wool and linen. Thus at the beginning of this century all the textile trades had been invaded by machinery. The hand-workers were beaten both in quality and in speed.

It was not only in weaving and spinning that inventions came. Just at the same time iron-masters learnt to use coal instead of charcoal for smelting. This sent our iron industry up with a Iron. leap. Later, an iron-master named Cort invented the puddling process, by which malleable iron could be made with coal. He also was the first to use rollers instead of the hammer for shaping his iron and squeezing out impurities. These discoveries made us the great iron-working country of the world. If we look at other industries we find the same progress. Those were the days of Wedgwood, the great potter, who did so much for the Staffordshire potteries; they were the days also of Brindley, who by his canals made it easy to send goods about Britain cheaply and quickly, instead of by the old expensive and slow method of road-wagons and pack-horses.

The latter half of the eighteenth century is the era of machinery. Machinery, however, called for power. Water-power was good where it could be had; but in our coal-fields lay vast stores of power, unused till the genius of a Scottish mechanic, James Watt, improved the steam-engine into Watt and the Steam-engine,
1763. being the ready servant of all manufacture. Industries which had settled on the banks of streams began to draw in to where coal was ready to hand. Factory villages speedily became factory towns, where a crowded population gathered round forests of tall chimneys. Thus grew Glasgow, Dundee, Liverpool, Manchester, Preston, Leeds, Bradford, and a host of others, soon leaving behind the old county towns.

This meant wealth for the manufacturers, and power for Britain, but it did not mean happiness for the workers. In the old days woollen weaving and spinning had been “by-industries” spread all over the country. Many cottages had a loom where the labourer worked when the long winter nights forbade him to work in the fields. There was scarcely a home without the spinning-wheel, at which the women of the house earned a steady sum each week. The new machinery silenced loom and wheel alike, and those who had eked out their earnings from the land by the aid of spinning and weaving were reduced to great poverty and misery. Many went into the new factory towns.

Here, though they got work, they got it under bad conditions. In the old days they could work when they pleased and leave off when they pleased. But in the factory all worked alike. No hours are too long for the giant Steam, and many masters overworked their people to keep up with their machinery. This was very hard on the numerous children employed. They often began at five in the morning, and worked till seven, eight, or even nine at night. There were no regular hours for meals; food was eaten in the mill, often covered with dust. The rooms were low and ill ventilated. Children were sometimes cruelly punished by the overseers—nay, even by their own parents—if they failed to fulfil their tasks. Machinery was unfenced, and accidents were hideously common when the children toiled so early and so late that they dropped to sleep over their work.

Britain's wealth was being bought too dear, if this was to continue. Women who were all day in the mill could not be good mothers. Children who had no time for play or for education were growing up ignorant, weakly, deformed, with no taste for anything healthy. They had indeed been "through the mill", with terrible consequences. So an agitation was started to shorten the hours for women and children.

The remedy was long in coming. Devoted men, Oastler, Fielden, Lord Shaftesbury, laboured away to persuade Parliament, but it was slow. ^{The Factory} work. Even Liberal statesmen, such as ^{Acts.} Bright and Gladstone, fought against the Factory Acts. By degrees right conquered. Act after act was passed shortening hours, granting a Saturday half-holiday, now in one trade, now in another. It was not, however, till 1847 that the working day was definitely adjusted.

The Factory Acts, chiefly passed by the Tories, are a striking example of good legislation. They have not injured our industries; they have saved our artisan class. The best proof of how necessary they are is that they have since been extended to embrace almost every trade.

If we sum up the results of the industrial revolution, they are these:—It made Britain rich, and therefore powerful; it made most of our large towns; it created the artisan class, which, though at first very hardly treated by the new conditions of labour, has now, under State protection, become the most numerous and energetic portion of the community. In addition to this, the industrial revolution curiously shifted the balance of population and wealth in England. Before it came, the South was rich, cultured, populous; the North backward and ignorant. Now the North is vigorous and active; the South has remained agricultural, and inclines to be stagnant. Sussex and Norfolk, once the homes of the iron trade and a busy woollen trade, are to-day sparsely peopled. Their industries have left them to go in search of northern coal. Lancashire, once almost the poorest county in England, has become the richest.

XXXIII.—CROWN AND PARLIAMENT.

THE REFORM BILL.

We have seen that the "Glorious Revolution" of 1689, which turned James II. from the throne, settled for ever the question between King and Parliament which should be master. Henceforward no king could hope to resist Parliament. Yet all the same another hundred and fifty years were to pass before it could be said with truth that Parliament alone ruled. For the kings, having failed in one plan, turned to another. Instead of ruling in defiance of Parliament, they began to rule Parliament itself; they obtained so much influence over ministers, members, and electors, that during the eighteenth century Parliament generally did what the king wanted.

We can perceive this more plainly by an example or two. Even as early as Anne's reign it becomes clear. Anne was at first in the hands of the Duchess of Marlborough. The duchess and her husband wanted the war to go on, and so did the Whig party. Therefore the duchess persuaded Anne to favour Whig ministers. At length Anne grew tired of the duchess and took a new favourite, Mrs. Masham. Mrs. Masham was a Tory, and so Anne turned gradually towards the Tories, who wanted to bring the war to an end. At last Tory ministers came in, and Marlborough was dismissed. It is true that the country approved of what the queen did, but had the queen not wished for a change, she could have kept Marlborough in power.

HAND-LOOM WEAVING AT SPITALFIELDS (see page 201)

From Hogarth's "Industry and Idleness", published in 1747

Again, George I. favoured the Whigs, and his son George II. did the same, because both feared that the Tories were hankering to have the Stuarts back. Accordingly the Whigs came into power with George I., and stayed in for about fifty years. One ministry followed another—Stanhope, Walpole, Carteret, Pelham, Newcastle, Pitt—but all were Whig. It is true that the kings were not responsible for this Whig monopoly of office. Neither George I. nor George II. took much interest in party questions. The great Whig families in England were at that time able by bribery and influence to keep Parliament full of Whigs. Being in office, the Whigs could, and did, use their power and patronage to keep themselves in office by favouring their supporters and making friends of those who were wavering. Yet we shall see that the kings' power was strong enough to break down the power of the Whig families when it was used against them.

George III. had been brought up to dislike the Whigs. His mother was never tired of saying to him in his boyhood, "George, be a king". He had learnt to think of the Whigs as the great foes of the royal power, so he favoured the Tories from the first. At first he found Parliament in the hands of the Whig houses. He tried a Tory minister, but the Commons and the Lords both contained a majority of Whigs. By degrees, however, the Tories, with the king's support, grew stronger: first he was able to put in power those Whigs whom he least disliked; finally, in 1783 he overthrew the great Whig coalition which was headed by Fox, and made a young man of twenty-four, William Pitt, son of the Great Commoner, prime minister. Henceforward for fifty years there were practically nothing but Tory ministries. Pitt himself was prime minister for nineteen years (1783-1801 and 1804-1806), Lord Liverpool for fifteen years (1812-1827). In fact power, which in the early part of the eighteenth century had seemed to belong entirely to the Whigs, appears in the latter part to be the absolute property of the Tories.

The fact was that the king had found out means to get a party of men in the Commons who would support whomsoever he wished. There were many ways of using this royal influence. Pensions and honours were freely given to members and their friends; promotion in the army and navy went much by royal favour; a friendly word from the king would secure the votes of those who liked to be thought intimate at court. Thus the name of the "King's Friends" was openly bestowed on a large party in the Commons. In the Lords things were even more simple, for the king could make whom he pleased a lord. Thus the House of Lords, Whig under the first two Georges, became strongly Tory under the third George. On one occasion, in order to defeat Fox's India Bill, the king made Lord Temple show to each peer a card on which he had written the message that "whoever voted for the India Bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as an enemy", and as a result the bill was thrown out.

The growth of this royal power by which Parliament was moulded to the king's wishes was plainly seen, and the Whig party did its best to check it. Bills were passed to diminish the king's patronage; and the Commons voted, "that the power of the Crown has increased, and ought to be diminished". This was an excellent piece of advice, but it was not clear how it could be carried out.

By degrees men came to see that the reason why Parliament had thus fallen into the hands of the king was that the House of Commons did not really represent the nation. Birmingham, Leeds, Manchester, and many of the big towns had no members, while little boroughs, where there was only a handful of voters, returned two. Gatton with seven electors sent up two members. Ludgershall had one elector: he proposed himself, voted for himself, and sat in Parliament as a representative of himself. Old Sarum was no longer even a village; there were absolutely no inhabitants, yet members sat for it. Even in the large towns and counties that had members, it was often the case that very few persons had the right to vote as electors. There were only thirty-three voters in Edinburgh, and the same number in Glasgow; only one hundred and fifteen in Argyllshire. "Pocket-boroughs", as they were called, enabled a rich patron to return many members at his wish. One duke returned eleven members, another nine, and of course in these small places everyone expected to be bribed before he would vote. When Sheridan was returned for Stafford an item in his election expenses ran thus, "Paid 250 burgesses £3 each".

Parliament did not Represent the Nation.

This plainly called for reform. We may wonder that reform did not come sooner, but during the long war against Napoleon men were too much interested in that to care about altering things at home. And what had been done in France made the Tory party nervous. They spoke of the reformers in Britain as if they were persons who wanted to make a revolution, to destroy the throne and turn Britain into a republic. Thus the wild things that had been done in the name of liberty in France, the execution of the king and queen, the murders of nobles, and the confiscation of property, had the result of putting off reform in Britain for nearly forty years.

Reform.

When King George III. died, however, the question could not be put off any longer. The Whigs at last George IV., got a majority in the Commons. Lord 1820-1830. Grey became Prime Minister, and Lord John Russell brought in the Reform Bill to take away the right of returning members from the pocket-boroughs, and give the seats to the counties and large towns. Then began a desperate struggle; the bill Reform Bill, 1831. was thrown out on the third reading, and Parliament dissolved. The country, however, was bent on reform, and the Whigs came back again with a huge majority—over a hundred. The Reform Bill passed the Commons in spite of all the Tories could do to delay it.

The fate of the bill now hung on the Lords, and the Lords rejected it. This nearly caused a rebellion. There were riots in many towns. The Duke of Rutland and Lord Nottingham had made themselves prominent by their opposition to the bill; Nottingham Castle was burnt to the ground and Belvoir Castle attacked by a furious mob. At Bristol the recorder was pelted in the streets, hustled into the Mansion-house, and at length forced to flee over the roofs to escape from his pursuers. Men collected arms, and spoke of marching on London; and in the capital itself shops were closed, church bells tolled in mourning, and a run was made on the Bank of England. When the king appeared in public he was hooted. At length he agreed to make 1832. enough Whig peers to get a majority in the Lords. The mere threat, however, was enough; the Lords gave way, and the bill became law.

Besides taking members from the rotten boroughs and giving them to the large towns and counties, the Reform Bill set up a uniform franchise. Hitherto almost every borough had had its own rules about who was to vote; now all were made alike—in the towns, occupiers of premises of £10 yearly value, and in the country, holders and occupiers of property of the same value, if they held a lease of sixty years: those who paid £50 annually in rent also got votes. Thus the lower classes got no votes: they were only given to shopkeepers, the richer artisans, farmers, and yeomen. Since that time the franchise has thrice been extended: once in 1867, when household suffrage was given in the towns; again in 1884, when this was extended to the counties; and, for the third time, in 1918, when, subject to certain limitations, the franchise was extended to women, so that Britain has become in reality democratic, that is to say, a country where the people have the main power.

Of these four Reform Bills the first was by far the most important, since it put an end once for all to the influence of the crown and of the House of Lords over the House of Commons. It was no longer possible to bribe the large new constituencies, or to influence the members they chose. Since the passage of the Reform Bill in 1832 the British monarch has ruled as a constitutional sovereign, that is to say, has followed the advice of ministers, and ministers have been the leaders of the winning side in the Commons. So Parliament is supreme, not the crown. People who did not clearly foresee what would happen, thought that after the Reform Bill the Whigs, or Liberals, would remain in power for another long period, say thirty or forty years, just as the Tories had remained before; but this turned out a complete mistake. Since it has become easy to consult the country by a general election, it is now more frequently consulted; and now no political party is likely to be able to keep its opponents out of office for any very long period of time.

XXXIV.—THE EPOCH OF REFORM.

The period from 1825 to 1850 is sometimes called the Epoch of Reform. We have already seen one Epoch of great reforming measure—the Reform Bill—Reform. which made Parliament really represent the nation. But there were many other measures of a similar kind. There were the Factory Acts, which have been already mentioned, and there was a reform in the Criminal Law, which had been extraordinarily severe. Men might be hanged for all sorts of offences; for example, for stealing five shillings' worth of goods from a shop, or for stealing at night with The Criminal Law. a blackened face, or for wounding cattle, or for sending threatening letters. All this severity did nothing to stop crime; rather it increased it. A thief who knew that he might be hanged for stealing did not hesitate to murder as well if it made his crime easier to commit: the punishment was no worse. Between 1810 and 1845 no fewer than 1400 persons were executed for crimes which are no longer punishable with death. Thanks to Samuel Romilly, Mackintosh, and Sir Robert Peel, these harsh laws were one by one abolished, and the death sentence was reserved for murder and treason.

Another reform was made in the Poor-law. During the distress of the long war, kind-hearted men who saw how dear bread was and how ^{The New Poor-}badly the farm-labourers were paid, ^{law, 1834.} had taken to helping them with allowances from the rates. This was well-meant, but perfectly disastrous, because it lowered wages and encouraged the lazy to become paupers. They were kept fairly comfortable, while industrious men who were too proud and too honest to ask for help, had to pay a share of the high rates on which the lazy and shiftless were supported. The New Poor-law stopped this wholesale giving of outdoor relief, and made paupers go into workhouses: as they did not like this, they were more ready to work hard for themselves.

Another great injustice was set right by 'putting an end to the oaths and laws which had prevented Catholics from sitting in Parliament. This was especially unjust to Ireland, where the greater number of the people were Catholic. A great ^{Catholic Eman-}Irish patriot named O'Connell was elected ^{cipation, 1829.} member for Clare; he was not allowed to sit in Parliament. Ireland seemed on the verge of civil war. Peel and Wellington, who were at the head of the Government, saw that though they did not themselves approve of Catholic Emancipation, they must yield, or run the risk of another Irish rebellion. They wisely gave way; and now no one would dream of excluding a man from Parliament because of his religion.

The slave-trade, too, was abolished in 1807, and, later, slavery itself was put an end to in British dominions (1834). It was only just that Britain should be the first to recognize the wickedness of slavery, since for many years she had been most vigorous in carrying it on.

These were all great reforms; two of them we have seen joined with the name of Peel; but this statesman was destined to carry a greater reform Peel. still, namely the abolition of the Corn-laws and the establishment of Free-trade. Curiously enough he at first disliked Free-trade, as he had disliked Catholic Emancipation. In each case his change of view made his followers furiously angry. People often hate a statesman who changes his mind; they call him a traitor. Peel's followers were wrong; and Peel was right, as everyone now admits, in changing his policy when he found it was necessary for the welfare of the country to do so.

We have already seen something of the old mercantile system. The jealousies which it had fostered Mercantile System. had helped to ruin the Darien Company; to escape from its restrictions Scotland had accepted the Union; chiefly also to escape the same restrictions, our American colonies had rebelled against us. Put shortly, the central idea was to protect British industries: it was thought that thus the country would be prosperous, and if we were to export a great deal more than we imported we should gain much money and so grow rich. Further, it was held that Britain ought to grow enough corn to feed her own people. So with the idea of encouraging the home corn-grower, taxes were laid on foreign corn.

For a time the system worked well enough: under it Britain did become a busy manufacturing country. But the growth of industry led to a growth of population; when small villages suddenly grew into big towns, it was impossible to grow enough corn at a moderately cheap rate to feed the new population. Besides, home industries under the mercantile system grew very quarrelsome. For example, men who made salt from brine urged that a tax should be put on the rock-salt workers, because they feared they would be ruined; wool workers clamoured against cotton and silk workers, because they said that if people bought cotton and silk goods they would buy less woollens; and so on. Each cantankerous set always professed to be looking at the good of the country; really they only cared for their own pockets.

In 1776 a Scot named Adam Smith published a great book called the Wealth of Nations, Adam Smith to prove that all these old-fashioned and Free-trade plans were useless. He preached the doctrine of Free-trade. If trade is made free, he urged, each trade will naturally go the way that is best; and what is best for the one, is best also for the mass. Therefore, he said, let us abolish all restrictions and duties which hamper trade.

Adam Smith soon had many followers. The younger Pitt abolished a great many duties and simplified others. It was indeed high time, for our customs duties had grown so complex that scarcely anyone understood them all. The same article often paid many different duties; to bring a pound of nutmegs into the country nine duties had to be paid. Huskisson followed in Pitt's footsteps. He altered the Navigation Acts, which had prevented goods coming to Britain in foreign ships; Huskisson, 1823. he reduced the duties on wool, on silk, on timber, and numerous other things. Shipbuilders, manufacturers, spinners, weavers, cried out that they would be ruined. Much to their surprise they all became a great deal more prosperous and busy. The fact was, that so long as we would not take goods from abroad, foreigners could not buy much from us, because it was difficult to pay in money. Directly, however, that France, for example, was free to send us wines, vinegar, silks, and lace, they could be exchanged for British iron, cottons, and woollens, That many of the duties were absolutely useless was further shown by the fact that they actually brought in less money than was spent in collecting them. So by degrees restrictions on manufactures were abolished.

There still remained, however, the Corn-laws, which, it was said, were for the good of the British farmer.

The Corn-laws. When it was proposed to abolish these and import corn into the country free of duty, all who held land or worked on it cried out in indignation that if this were done they would be ruined.

It was easy to show that the Corn-laws made bread dearer than it need have been; that in times of scarcity artisans were starving because the law forbade cheap corn to be brought from abroad. But there was more than this. The Corn-laws were not doing any good to either farmers or farm-labourers. The price of corn was high, certainly; but the higher it went, the higher went the rent, so that the landlord was really the only one to benefit. Thus the Corn-laws taxed the food of the poor, and filled the pockets of the rich.

The man who made this clear to the nation was Richard Cobden. He went up and down the country speaking and arguing; he found a helper Cobden. in John Bright; he started the Anti-Corn-law League to spread his ideas. Everywhere he strove to make the electors choose only those who were ready to vote against the Corn-laws.

Cobden's work, however, was but half done. The Free-traders in the Commons indeed were growing in numbers, and the Whig party favoured them; but the Tories were in power with Peel at their head, and Peel was believed to have given his pledge to stand by the Corn-laws. Suddenly the potato-rot began in Ireland; the chief article of food for a whole people failed; if the Irish were to be saved from starvation corn must be sent thither, and to get the corn it would be necessary to admit foreign corn free of duty. Here was the Free-traders' chance. "Famine," said John Bright, "against which we had warred, joined us." Peel saw that the ports must be opened to let in corn from abroad; and he saw further that it would be impossible ever to close them again. His followers would not listen to him. They decided against free corn, and Peel resigned. However, Lord John Russell could not form a Whig Ministry, and Peel had to come back. The sight was a strange one—a Tory minister, supported by the Whigs and a few of his own friends, and opposed by the party that had placed him in power, proposed the very measure he had been relied on to reject. Yet, amid the most bitter attacks, the most galling charges of desertion and treachery, Peel held on his way, and the Corn-laws were repealed.

The Irish Famine.

Repeal of the Corn-laws,
1846.

With the Corn-laws went the last of the old system. It was thought by those who were eager for the freeing of trade that other countries would soon follow Britain's example. This has not happened. Most countries have continued to impose duties on imports for the protection of their home productions, and many such countries have prospered greatly. The United States of America is perhaps the most striking example, though, as she can produce her own foodstuffs, she is in a different position from Great Britain. We have to import much of our food.

XXXV.—CRIMEAN WAR. INDIAN MUTINY.

With Free-trade came a period of great industrial prosperity in Britain. After the Great Exhibition in 1851, to which masses of foreigners came to see British goods and to exhibit their own, a number of people began to think that European wars were at an end, and that, for the future, states would content themselves with friendly rivalry in trade and commerce. This was an unduly hopeful view. The course of the next ten years was to see Britain engaged in two great struggles.

We have followed British ambition in many fields: till the end of the fifteenth century in France; in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries mainly in America; now principally in the East. As our Indian empire has grown we have come to rule more Mohammedans, and to be more concerned in Eastern affairs, than any other state in the world. Our most dangerous rival was Russia. Thus it was part of our policy to help Turkey against Russia, and most of all to guard against Russia getting Constantinople; to protect our Indian frontier from Russian attack; and later to check Russian power in China. In the middle of the nineteenth century, however, Russia had hardly become dangerous either in India or China; but it seemed likely that she might overthrow Turkey completely. So Britain and France joined together to aid the Turks.

Rivalry with Russia in the East.

To cripple the power of Russia in the Black Sea it was resolved to attack the fortress of Sevastopol. A British and French army was landed and won the battle of the Alma; and, had the allies pushed on at once, they might have taken Sevastopol with a rush. The generals, however, were over-cautious. They marched round to the southern side of the city, and began a regular siege. This was likely to be a long business.

The Crimean War, 1854-56.

The Russians soon showed that they did not mean to leave the allies to conduct the siege quietly. First they made an attack on Balaklava, the port where all the British stores lay. The British were outnumbered, but two famous cavalry charges saved the day. The Heavies rode at an immense mass of Russian cavalry uphill, fought their way through them, and broke them. The Light Brigade, mistaking an order, charged the Russian guns. Tennyson tells us how—“ Storm’d at with shot and shell,

Boldly they rode and well,
Into the jaws of Death,
Into the mouth of Hell
Rode the Six Hundred.

Flash’d all their sabres bare,
Flash’d as they turn’d in air
Sabring the gunners there,
Charging an army, while
All the world wonder’d:
Plunged in the battery smoke
Right through the line they broke.

Then they rode back, but not—
Not the Six Hundred.”

If Balaklava should be ever remembered to the honour of our cavalry, Inkerman was as glorious for our infantry. In the grey dawn of a November morning the Russians flung 40,000 men on the British lines. Our troops were surprised. The Russians were five to one, and made sure of victory, but they did not know that the British soldier cared nothing for odds. Wherever the Russians appeared they were met with the bayonet; a British company would charge a regiment; a regiment break a Russian column. Desperate hand-to-hand fighting at last won the day, and hurled the Russians back into Sevastopol.

All this made people at home proud of our army, but it did little to take Sevastopol. Winter came on, cold and piercing. The troops were badly supplied with food and shelter. In the hospital at Scutari the sick and wounded were dying for want of nursing. Hearing of this, Miss Florence Nightingale volunteered to go out. Other ladies went with her. To her kind and gentle care many a British soldier owed his life. By her efforts the hospital was set in order. She let nothing stand in the way of the good of her wounded men. One night some stores which she wanted urgently were refused on the ground that they could not be given without a signed order. She would not allow the wounded to die on account of absurd rules of this kind. She had the stores opened, and took what she wanted.

At last the British and French lines drew closer to Sevastopol. The fire of the Russian guns was beaten down. The French made an assault, and took the great fort called the Malakhoff. After this the Russians could not hold the town, and it fell. Peace was made in 1856.

Inkerman,
1854.

Miss Florence
Nightingale.

The Crimean War did little to check Russia. In twenty years all the arrangements of the peace were Results of the Crimean War. overthrown. But it made the War Office at home wake up to the need of reforms. It was in the Crimean War that newspaper correspondents first sent home full and trustworthy accounts of how our men were faring. Britain learnt the truth about war. It was not a pleasant truth. We had got out of the habit of making war, and at first everything went wrong. Transport, commissariat, hospitals—all were grossly mismanaged. The lesson of our failures was laid to heart, and improvements were made in the arrangements for equipping and for supplying the troops in the field with provisions, ammunitions, and means of shelter. Matters were never again quite so bad. The Crimean War came after the long peace.

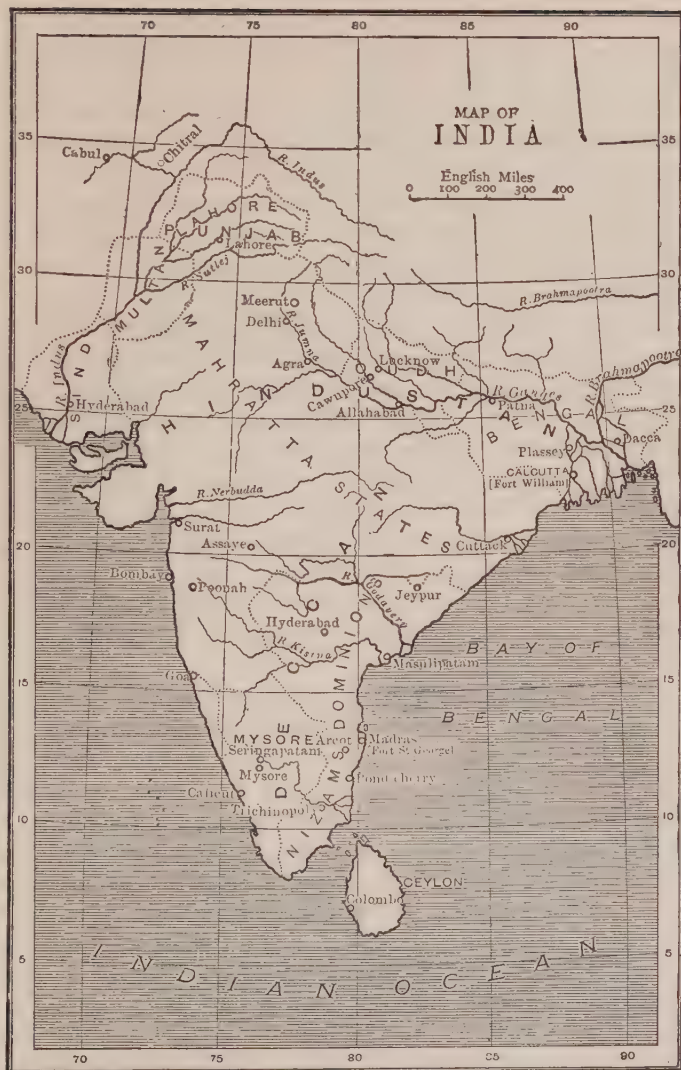

In a year we were again engaged in war—this time in India. Since the days of Warren Hastings, the India. East India Company had steadily extended its power. One native prince after another had seen his dominions taken by the Company; those who remained thought their turn would come next. Thus they were ready to rebel, when an accident made rebellion easy. The Sepoys were given a new rifle, and the cartridges for it had to be greased. The story went about that the grease was made of pigs' fat and cows' fat. To a Mohammedan the pig is unclean, and a Hindoo holds the cow to be sacred. He believed that if he handled these cartridges he would be defiled; he would lose caste,—that is to say, his friends would despise him; and he also believed that he would be punished for his offence in the next world. Thus the Sepoys became mu-
The Indian Mutiny, 1857. tinous. At Meerut they fired on their British officers, and marched off to Delhi. At Lucknow a tiny British garrison under Sir Henry Lawrence was besieged in the Residency by hosts of natives. At Cawnpore there were about a thousand British men, women, and children. They took refuge in a hospital surrounded by a low mud wall, not thick enough to stop the bullets. There was no shelter from the scorching Indian sun; the one well was swept by the mutineers' fire; every man who went to draw water did it at the risk of his life. One by one the defenders fell. Still, the mutineers could not storm the wall. Nana Sahib, who commanded them, determined to do by treachery what he could not do by force. He offered the British to send them away by river, but when they were embarked his men shot them down from the banks. A few women and children were saved for a worse fate. They were imprisoned in a house for a few days. Then murderers were sent in to butcher them with swords. It is no wonder that when the British troops again entered Cawnpore they cried for a bitter vengeance on the mutineers.

From a photograph

RUINS OF THE RESIDENCY, LUCKNOW

First, however, Delhi had to be taken. It was a desperate task for a mere handful of British troops to capture a great city swarming with mutineers. Yet it was done. John Lawrence, governor of the Punjab, sent every man he could spare to help the scanty force clinging to the Delhi ridge, themselves rather besieged than besieging. He sent, too, an officer, John Nicholson, who saw that Delhi must be taken at all hazards. Nothing could resist Nicholson's fiery courage. Breaches were made in the walls. The Kashmir Gate was blown up. The troops rushed in. Nicholson headed a storming party, and was mortally wounded in the streets; but he had done his work. Delhi was taken, and the British power in India saved.

Meantime Lucknow held out bravely against numberless assaults. The walls crumbled under cannon fire; mines were exploded under the feet of the garrison. The commander, Henry Law-^{Lucknow relieved.} rence, brother of the governor of the Punjab, was killed by a shell. At last Havelock reached them with a relieving force. It is said that the first token which the garrison had of his being close at hand was given by a Scottish girl, who above the din of the firing heard the pipes of Havelock's Highlanders. It was a welcome sound to the garrison, worn out with eighty-seven days' siege and privations.

By degrees more British troops reached India, and Sir Colin Campbell was able to put down the remains of the mutiny. Of the mutineers those who were proved guilty of murder were punished, but the governor-general, Lord Canning, forbade any kind of vengeance.

When the mutiny was over it was felt that the time had come to take India from the hands of the old East India Company, so the Company was dissolved, and all the Indian gov-^{Dissolution of the East India Company, 1858.} ernment put under the crown. There was a secretary for India, who sat in the Cabinet and was assisted by a council, and India was ruled by a British Viceroy, aided by a council of British civil servants, and British officials. The number of British troops was increased, and the artillery was kept entirely in British hands. There are still some states in India where native rulers hold power, but they have a British resident at their courts, and they would not be allowed to make war on each other, to have direct dealings with a foreign power, or in any way injure British interests. Lastly, in 1877 Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India, and the native rulers owned the British monarch as their sovereign.

Under British rule peace was established, and India began to prosper. Plague and famine were met by measures which took from them much of their former deadliness. Order was maintained on the border; and, where, as in the cases of Upper Burma in 1887 and Manipur in 1892, other means failed, the country was annexed to the Empire. A threatened conflict with Russia, and the murder of a British agent in Kabul led to a war with Afghanistan, 1878-1880, the most noted incident of which was the famous march from Kabul to Kandahar under General Roberts. On the north-western and northern frontier there have been many expeditions to maintain order. Of these the most important were the Chitral expedition in 1895 and the expedition to Tibet ten years later. The chief feature of Indian history, however, since the abolition of the East India Company has been the increasing share given to Indians in the management of affairs. The State-entry of the King-Emperor and of the Queen-Empress Mary into Delhi on 7th December, 1911, and the Coronation Durbar on the 11th called forth loyalty to the sovereigns.

XXXVI.

GREAT PARLIAMENTARY LEADERS—PALMERSTON, DISRAELI, GLADSTONE.

There are four specially outstanding names connected with our parliamentary history since the Reform Bill—those of Peel, Palmerston, Disraeli, and Gladstone. They were all great leaders in the House of Commons, the place from which a statesman can exercise the highest influence. After the retirement of Gladstone no one had the same chance of occupying as great a position, for both Lord Salisbury and Lord Rosebery, the Conservative and Liberal premiers, were in the House of Lords. A member of the Lords may be a capable prime minister and an excellent statesman, but he cannot be a great parliamentary leader in the sense that both the Pitts and the four prime ministers mentioned above were great, because he cannot sit in the Commons and sway the House by his speeches, nor can he take any active part at elections.

When in 1846 Peel gave Britain free-trade in corn, and was, within a few days of the passing of the Act, driven from office by those Tories whom he had angered by what they called his treachery, he was less than sixty years of age. It might have been thought that a man who was in reality so much respected would survive to become prime minister again. But Peel without ever again holding office died in 1850 from a fall from his horse.

His death left Lord Palmerston, an Irish peer, the man most trusted by the nation. Although a Whig, Palmerston was opposed to any further lowering of the franchise, and so long as he lived he would have nothing to do with more reform in Parliament.

Palmerston.

In foreign policy, on the other hand, Palmerston displayed an activity which his party nowadays would think to be contrary to its traditions. As foreign minister he liked to do as he wished, "to make strokes off his own bat", as he said; and twice he gave much offence to Queen Victoria by doing things without consulting her. On the second occasion he had to resign. Men said "Palmerston is smashed", but he knew better. When the news of the Crimean winter came home, and Britain heard the stories of the neglect and stupidity at head-quarters—of coffee sent out unroasted, and consignments of boots all to fit the left foot,—there was great anger with Aberdeen's government. Aberdeen resigned, and the only man that the country would accept as prime minister was Palmerston. It was a time of trouble, and a strong man was wanted. It was said that "we turned out the Quaker and put in the Pugilist". Palmerston made an excellent pugilist. He brought the Crimean War to an end. He had to deal too with the dangers of the Mutiny; and he did so with a firm hand. So great was the trust that Britons felt in him, that even when he went wrong they preferred his rule to that of anyone else. On one occasion we got into a dispute with China because the Chinese had boarded a Chinese vessel flying the British flag. It had no right to fly it, and the Chinese were doing us no injury. Palmerston, however, said our flag was insulted, and went to war about it. His enemies in Parliament thought this a good chance to attack him. Gladstone, Disraeli, Lord John Russell, and Bright, men of very different opinions, all fell on him and defeated him. Palmerston did not resign, but dissolved Parliament; the electors sent him back with a large majority. Several of his opponents lost their seats.

The secret of his power was that he was a thorough Briton. He believed in his country, and his country believed in him. So for ten years, with one short interval, he remained prime minister. He was often supported by those who did not, strictly speaking, belong to his party, because he was not a party man. It was not till his death, in 1865, that the modern division between Liberals and Conservatives was clearly drawn.

In Palmerston's ministry Gladstone had been chancellor of the exchequer. He had shown great skill in dealing with money matters. He was so attractive a speaker that he could make even the figures of a budget interesting. But he had a very different idea of the duties of his party from Palmerston. Palmerston knew that he would make great changes. "Whenever he gets my place," he said, "we shall have strange doings."

Gladstone and the Party of the People.

Gladstone aimed at putting power really into the hands of the masses. He was not a Whig; he was rather a Radical. His party, the Liberals, was to be the party of the people; his policy that of "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform".

Thus Gladstone's ministries caused the state to undertake all sorts of duties, instead of leaving these to private persons; and whatever he thought to be unjust, ineffective, or useless he tried to set right, improve, or abolish, without regarding whether it had existed for a long time or not. Thus he passed the Education Act showing that the Government intended everyone to learn at least to read and write; and the Ballot Act, which secured voters from being influenced at elections, by making it impossible to find out how they had voted. He abolished the system whereby officers in the army could buy promotion, and so threw the highest ranks in the army open to any man who showed great ability. Further, he disestablished the Irish Protestant Church because it was not the church of the people at large, and he carried an Irish Land Act which improved the position of Irish tenants. He saw that Ireland had had bad government, and he hoped to satisfy Irishmen by his reforms. As we shall see, he was not successful.

Great Measures.

Opposed to Gladstone stood Disraeli. He had become the leader of the Protectionist party which had rebelled against Peel. But Disraeli was much too clever to think that at that moment anything could be done with "Protection" as a party cry. He knew that if the Liberals offered reforms, the Conservatives could not afford to lag behind. He had once said of Peel's action in taking over the Whig measure of free-trade, that "Peel had caught the Whigs bathing, and had walked away with their clothes". It was exactly what he came to do himself. Thus in 1867, when the Liberals were crying out for reform in the franchise, he resolved to take the wind out of their sails by a Reform Bill of his own. He passed a most Radical measure, giving household franchise in the towns. It was, as Lord Derby described it, "a leap in the dark", yet all the same, in Disraeli's words, "it dished the Whigs". The Conservatives took the credit.

Yet Disraeli was much more than a clever party leader. The Liberal cry was "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform". He too would be a reformer. But he recognized that peace and retrenchment could be carried too far. Britain needs must be at war sometimes; to shrink from war would make other nations try to override us; to make war cheaply was to make it badly. Disraeli in fact was an Imperialist. He believed in the British empire; he wished to extend it, to make its power felt abroad, even at the risk of war. Thus he sent the British fleet to Constantinople in 1878, when the Russian armies were within striking distance of the town. This firmness made Russia pause and agree to the Treaty of Berlin. Disraeli himself, by this time made Lord Beaconsfield, went to the Conference, and returned bringing, as he said, "Peace with Honour". He had made Britain play a great and dignified part, and Britain was proud of him. Another stroke of his policy was his purchase for the nation by telegram of about £4,000,000 worth of shares in the Suez Canal, which the Khedive wished to sell. The Canal is very important to us as a maritime and colonial power; and through the shares, now valued at £20,000,000, we have a powerful voice in its management.

Thus Disraeli made his party willing to consider reforms, and he made it imperialist. This has become of great consequence, because of late years most Britons have grown to think a great deal more of the empire than they did forty years ago. Among other things that have caused this growth of imperialist feeling were the two jubilees of Queen Victoria, and the enthusiasm which not only all at home, but her scattered subjects all over the world, felt for her, and the readiness of the Colonies to come to the help of the mother country shown in the Egyptian, South African, and World Wars.

When in 1880 Disraeli's ministry fell and Gladstone came in again, he intended to pursue the same policy as before—namely, to make reforms at home, and interfere as little as possible abroad. He was not, however, successful. He had a war against the Boers of the Transvaal, which ended disastrously; and he was drawn to interfere in Egypt. We shall see more of these events in the next chapter. But what stood in Gladstone's way even more than affairs in the Transvaal and in Egypt, was the Irish party. They were trying to get Home Rule. The Irish members in the House of Commons did their best to hamper Gladstone's legislation. In Ireland many tenants refused to pay their rents. Landlords and bailiffs were threatened and murdered. Some violent and reckless men used dynamite for outrage and intimidation. At last the Irish secretary, Lord Frederick Cavendish, was stabbed in Phoenix Park. In consequence Gladstone felt compelled to pass very severe measures to keep order there.

At length he became convinced that the policy of severity, of "coercion", as it was called, was a failure, and he resolved to grant Home Rule. This meant to repeal the Union of 1800. A number of Liberals, headed by Mr. Bright, Lord Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Goschen, would not agree to this. They broke off from Gladstone, and, taking the title of Liberal Unionists, supported Lord Salisbury. The Home Rule Bill was rejected; and though six years later Gladstone got it through the House of Commons, it was thrown out in the Lords. Not till the veto of the Lords had been abolished was the Home Rule Bill passed, and not till 1922 was the Irish Free State given the position of a self-governing colony.

Thus Ireland proved a great stumbling-block in Gladstone's way. First he made the Irish hate him because he had to pass stern laws against the crimes that went on in Ireland; and then, when he tried to satisfy the Irish by promising Home Rule, he wrecked his own party. In consequence, his latter years were so much taken up with Irish legislation that many of his ideas of reform at home had to be abandoned.

Gladstone retired in 1894, and died four years after. He raised his party to a wonderful height of popularity; in his latter days he brought it to the ground in confusion and humiliation.

XXXVII.—BRITISH POWER IN AFRICA.

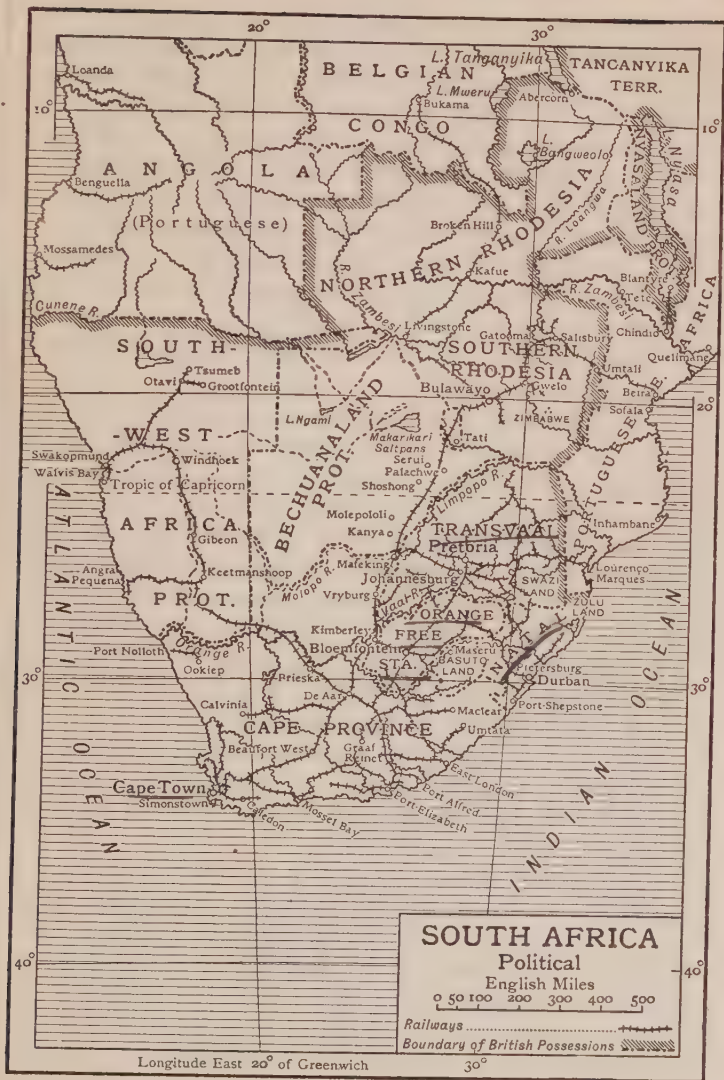

The result of the long wars during the eighteenth century was to leave Britain almost alone as a colonial power. Only British colonies seemed to prosper. Then there arose in European nations a fresh desire for colonies. Germany, France, Italy, recognizing that much of ^{The Expansion} of Europe. Britain's power comes from her colonial empire, began to strive to spread their power abroad also. Russia, too, held steadily to a policy of extending her dominions eastward in Asia; and even the United States embarked on the same course by taking Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. In China, too, the European powers were rivals for trading liberties, spheres of influence, and naval stations. But in no part of the world was this European colonial spirit, this imitation of British policy, more marked than in Africa.

Fifty years ago, save in the South and in Algeria;

the European settlements formed a scanty fringe on the coast. African colonies could not prosper while this was the case, for as a rule the climate of the coast was deadly to Europeans. Sierra Leone was called "the White Man's Grave", but many other coast stations equally deserved the name. The interior, being higher, was more free from the fevers that haunted the marshy coasts of East and West Africa. But much of the interior was then a No-man's Land, only half-explored, belonging to savage tribes who owned no European masters. Now, however, almost the whole continent is parcelled out among European nations.

Cape Colony came finally into our hands from the Dutch in 1815. It was only very gradually that our power spread inland. At first the colonists had to contend with the Kaffirs, and many wars were fought ere these were reduced to obedience. Further, the Boers, the descendants of the Dutch colonists, did not get on well with the British, and in 1835 some thousands of them trekked northwards, taking with them wives and children, flocks and herds, and settled in Natal. This was annexed by Britain, so many Boers moved farther inland and founded the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republic, so as to get clear of British rule. It was not till 1854 that Cape Colony held its first parliament. The same year saw the appointment as governor of Sir George Grey, whose name will always be gratefully remembered in South Africa as the statesman whose wise rule began the new era of prosperity.

By degrees British power spread northwards. The discovery of diamonds at Kimberley led to the adding of Griqualand. Under Disraeli, who never shrank from adding to the empire, the Zulus were subdued after hard fighting, and the Transvaal annexed. The Boers, however, rebelled; their men, being excellent shots and skilled in irregular warfare among rocky and broken country, completely defeated the British forces. In the last battle, at Majuba Hill, the British commander, Sir George Colley, was killed. Gladstone, who thought that the annexation of the Transvaal had been unjust, gave back to the Boers a modified form of independence; Britain was to remain suzerain of the Transvaal, and the Boer Government was not allowed to make treaties with foreign powers unless Britain gave her consent.

This did not at the time seem very important, save that it is not usual to see Britain give up claims which she has once asserted. The case was altered by the discovery of the gold-mines of the Rand. Speedily there were thousands of Britons in the Transvaal. Johannesburg became mainly a British city, and difficulties arose between the British and the Boer controllers of the country. The British did not think themselves well treated by Paul Krüger, the president of the Transvaal, who would not grant the Uitlanders (foreigners) the rights of citizens. A feeling of hostility to him sprang up, which led at the end of 1895 to the rash and foolish "Jameson's raid", and eventually to the Boer war of 1899-1902.

In the meantime important events for the future of South Africa had been taking place. It was Mr. Cecil Rhodes's work which added the great territory called after his name—Rhodesia—to the British Empire. This district is fertile, well watered, and mostly healthy. Mr. Rhodes showed wonderful skill in dealing with the natives. On one occasion, when the Matabele had been besieging Buluwayo and killing every white man who fell into their hands, he went out unarmed into the Matabele camp, and there at the risk of his life discussed on what terms peace could be made.

Perhaps the most striking example of the spread of our influence has been in a country which was not till later a British possession—Egypt. Not only was the Suez Canal vitally important to ^{Egypt.} us as the great maritime nation of the world, but we, as well as other European nations, had lent much money to the Egyptian Government. To prevent Egypt being altogether misruled and going bankrupt, France and Britain had set up the Dual Control in Egypt, by which they promised to keep Tewfik, who ruled the country as Viceroy of the Sultan of Turkey, on the throne, so long as he governed fairly well. In 1882 an Egyptian soldier named Arabi began a revolt against Tewfik, and seized Alexandria. There were riots, and Europeans were robbed and murdered. It was plainly necessary to interfere. France, however, refused to do so; and Britain had to act alone. Alexandria was bombarded, and an army under Sir Garnet Wolseley met Arabi's forces at Tel-el-Kebir, and scattered them.

Arabi's defeat showed how worthless the Egyptian army was; but this was made still more clear by events in the Sudan. A fanatic prophet, ^{The Sudan.} the Mahdi, gathered a body of Dervish followers and beat the Egyptian troops wherever he met them. Numbers flocked to his standard. Colonel Hicks (Hicks Pasha), with an Egyptian force of 10,000 men, was utterly routed at Kashgal near El Obeid. Scarcely a man escaped. Khartoum, ^{1883.} to which the British Government had sent General Gordon to try to restore order, was besieged, and, a few days before the arrival of the relieving force, was stormed, and Gordon was murdered. The Sudan was lost. What had been a prosperous country was given up to brutal and ignorant savages. The Dervishes even tried to invade Egypt.

The Mahdi died and the Khalifa succeeded him. In 1896 the work of reconquest was begun by a mixed force of British and Egyptian troops under Battle of Omdurman. the new Sirdar, General Kitchener. No mistakes were made and no risks run. In April, 1898, the Dervishes were driven from a strong position on the Atbara; in August the army drew near to Khartoum. Outside Omdurman the Dervishes fought a desperate battle, but it was their last. There were over forty thousand of them. They charged with all the reckless valour that had won victory after victory in the old days; but they had a new enemy to meet. They could not stand before the deadly volleys poured on them. In the evening of the same day, Friday, September 2nd, Khartoum, after thirteen years of Dervish rule, was recovered.

XXXVIII.—THE NEW COLONIAL SYSTEM.

We have seen that when our first American colonies shook off our rule, and made themselves independent, the British people took Colonial Policy. the loss surprisingly calmly. They persuaded themselves that it was what they had expected. It was, they said, natural. Some writers even went so far as to say that sooner or later all our colonies would do the same. Like fruit from a tree, when the colonies were ripe they would drop off.

Photo. Underwood & Underwood

THE GOVERNOR'S PALACE, KHARTOUM
Occupied by General Gordon

This view seemed reasonable; but time has proved it to be wrong. The United States, indeed, broke away; but no colony has followed this example. And now, as we know, the tie that joins the citizens of Greater Britain to what they all call "home", or "the old country", is as close as ever. The fact is, that the argument founded on the loss of the United States, was based on the idea that we should continue to treat our other colonies as we had treated them. We have not done so. Our statesmen have learned a lesson. What we rule well we keep. What is the secret of this better government on the part of Britain?

The answer seems a strange one. The problem of how to rule better has been solved by not ruling at all. Britain has in most respects left off governing her colonies. She has Self-government. given them self-government, the right to manage their own affairs so long as they do not do anything strongly against the interest of the empire. Thus our colonists no longer wish to become independent in name, because they are already really independent in fact. They rule their own country; yet they have the glory, the reputation, the might of their mother country, Britain, at their backs. Thus they have all the gains of independence and none of the disadvantages of being forced to guard themselves against the attacks of powerful neighbours. The British flag covers them all.

By Pitt's Canada Act of 1791 the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada (divided by the Ottawa River) had been given a sort of a constitution. Canada. It was, however, a pretence, the shadow of self-government, not the reality. For though each colony had an elected Assembly to make laws, yet the real government was in the hands of a council named by the governor sent out from England, and the Assembly had no power over this council. In Britain Parliament can turn out ministers whom it dislikes; in Canada this could not be done. Thus ministers and Assemblies were continually quarrelling.

Besides this there were other causes of complaint. Lower Canada was mainly French, Upper Canada British, and the races were jealous of each other. Then there was a small body of persons, friends of the Government, who got all the offices, and this was felt as a grievance. Thus both the Canadas were discontented. When in 1837 the Te Deum was sung for the accession of our Queen, many Canadians walked out of the churches. In the same year a rebellion began both in Lower and Upper Canada.

This rebellion failed; but it had one good effect: it called the attention of Britain to the feelings of the Canadians. Britain had reformed her own Parliament; the time had come to reform her colonial system also. Lord Durham was sent to Canada. In Lord Durham's some ways he acted illegally; and he was Policy. soon recalled; but he issued a Report which opened men's eyes at home. The outcome of it was the Act of 1840, by which the two Canadas were again united and the ministers were made to depend upon the support of the elected Legislative Assembly. Since the Assembly could choose its own ministers it could in fact govern as it pleased.

This plan of "responsible government" has proved completely successful. The Act of 1840 united Upper The Dominion and Lower Canada; Nova Scotia, New of Canada. Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia still remained separate. But the new prosperity of Canada suggested that it would be well to carry union further, to knit all these colonies together in one federation. In the course of the years 1867-71 this was arranged. The provinces keep their separate local assemblies to look after their local affairs, but they each send members to the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada as the new federation is called. This Parliament, which consists of two houses, the "Senate" and the "House of Commons", deals with all general matters: state debts, loans, and taxation; banking and coinage; naval and military service; the law, the public service, and railways.

This union, established by the British North America Act of 1867, and commemorated by the keeping of 1st July—"Dominion Day"—as a general holiday, has been extended to include new provinces as settlers pushed farther west and grew in numbers. Thus Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, The Yukon, and the North-west Territories have been included. Newfoundland alone stands out.

In our sketch of the Australian colonies it will not be necessary to repeat the story of the advantages of responsible government. The course of events by which the various Australian colonies gained it did not always run in the same way. The important thing to remark is that without it they were ill-content; with it they became satisfied, and grew each year more loyal. In another respect there was a further advance in imitation of Canada. For many years far-sighted Australian statesmen worked for a federation of all the Australian group of colonies, and the Commonwealth of Australia was established in 1900.

An account of our Australian colonies, however brief, would be incomplete without some reference to the great part which gold-mining has played in their development. No doubt agriculture, manufacture, and commerce are more enduring foundations for the prosperity of a country; but a new land wants capital and inhabitants to develop its resources, and unless there is a great attraction these will come slowly. Thus for many years New South Wales was thought fit only for a convict settlement. However, in 1849, the system of transportation was finally abolished, and close on this came the discovery of the gold-fields in New South Wales and Victoria; soon after, gold was found in Queensland; and, last of all, Western Australia turned out as lucky as the others. This brought a host of immigrants bent on making their fortunes. Of course they did not all succeed; but they made the fortune of Australia. The colonies became rich and populous. Many who had come to search for gold remained to engage in the less romantic tasks of farming and trading. In 1850 Victoria was sparsely peopled, its capital, Melbourne, scarcely more than a township. Now it is a stately city, and with its suburbs reckons over three-quarters of a million inhabitants. The elder city of Sydney, in New South Wales, with its magnificent natural harbour, has a population of nearly a million.

From the time of "Jameson's raid" onward the two Boer Republics of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal began to think of getting rid of the suzerainty of Great Britain. They gathered arms and stores, and in October, 1899, they declared war. It was a long weary war in which courage and tenacity were displayed on both sides. However, by degrees, Lord Kitchener got the upper hand, and the Boers surrendered to superior force in 1902.

On the 15th of May of that year terms of peace were arranged at Vereeniging, by which the Transvaal and the Orange Free State became British colonies with expectation of receiving constitutional government at no distant date. Both sides had learned to respect each other's bravery, and both sides had been careful to keep the war "a white war", and never to let the natives interfere at all. So the quarrel speedily healed. In less than ten years Britain was able to give back to the rebellious states most of their independence; in 1910 both of them joined with Cape Colony and Natal to form the Union of South Africa, and of this Union the first Premier was General Botha, who had been commander-in-chief of the Boer armies against us; but who now became minister under the British crown.

New Zealand, the youngest of our self-governing colonies, has had, on the whole, a very prosperous career. Taken possession of as a colony in 1840, its progress was somewhat delayed by the struggle with the natives, the Maori War, 1861 to 1871. But before and since the Dominion has prospered, and no other colony has shown more devoted loyalty and love of the mother country.

In the story of the growth of our empire there is much to make us proud. Yet there have been failures in the past, and there are many difficulties and responsibilities in the time to come which should keep us from being boastful. We owe our empire, not only to the courage and enterprise, but also to the wisdom and sense of duty which have animated the best men of our nation. So long as

Union of South Africa.

Future of the Empire.

Britain can continue to produce as great sons in the future as those who have served her in the past, there is no need to fear. Yet history shows that the character of a nation is not necessarily permanent. It may change as the character of a man changes; the hardy, simple Roman became in time feeble and luxurious, and the energetic Spaniard sank by degrees into lethargy; and should the stamp of our race show signs of deteriorating in the same way, then nei' r wealth at home nor wide-spread dominions abroad could avail us. It is, indeed, upon the character of the British people that the future of the British empire depends.

XXXIX.—THE MARCH OF EVENTS.

Before the Boer war was ended the beloved Queen Victoria died. She had reigned longer than any other British sovereign. There is no need to describe the love which all her subjects felt for her, or to dwell on the loss to the empire of the sovereign who had for so long watched over its destinies.

It is most difficult to judge rightly about times which are close to us. Things which are Social Legislation. near seem so unduly big, and one can never tell what things are going to remain important and what things will grow less so as they recede. But it seems as if the reign of Edward VII was a somewhat important turning-point in our history, both at home and abroad. At home the period of comparative quiet in politics ended with the General Election of 1906. This, as was to be expected, gave the Radical party a huge majority. The Conservatives had been in power for ten years, and it generally happens that when the change comes in such cases, it is a violent one. With the Radicals again in power under Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Britain saw a great revival of activity in social legislation. The same thing marked the beginning of Gladstone's period in 1868. Measures, such as Old Age Pensions and a system of National Insurance, which had been talked of often, at length took shape. A third party, the Labour Party, had come into prominence. It was the Labour Party that pressed for the social legislation; and the question between the Radicals and the Unionists was brought to a head when the Lords refused to pass the Budget of 1909. Mr. Asquith, who had become Premier on Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's death, dissolved Parliament. In the elections which followed the Unionists gained many seats, but the alliance of Radicals, Labour members, and Home Rulers was still left with a considerable majority; and the outcome of this was the Parliament Act, and the passing through Parliament in 1914 of the Home Rule Act. The Parliament Act, which provides that a measure passed by the Commons for three consecutive sessions can become law, even if the Lords throw it out, has deeply changed our plan of government. Britain can hardly be said any longer to be under a system of two chambers. The House of Lords can only delay; it can no longer reject. Nor can it, as it has always been able to do hitherto, compel a Government to refer any matter to a General Election for settlement.

The Parliament
Act and Home Rule.

These heated quarrels in politics began in King Edward's reign and have gone on ever since. But another and more important change in British policy we owe very directly to King Edward. It was his statesmanship that brought the Boer War to an end; and he, also, was the first to realize how dangerously isolated Britain was. We had no friends on the Continent. We had formed the habit of holding aloof from Continental affairs, contenting ourselves with our supremacy at sea and our Empire over-seas. This self-centredness appeared to outsiders as mere selfishness, and had we met with any real disaster in the Boer War, it is likely that there would have been a great Continental alliance against us. King Edward, who knew foreign affairs better than any of his ministers, saw the danger. With much tact and wisdom he set himself to heal the remains of soreness between us and our neighbour, France, over affairs in Egypt and the Sudan. It was his work that the nations drew together in friendship, and the Entente Cordiale took the place of the old suspicions and jealousies.

This good understanding between us and France, however, was much disliked in Germany. Ever since 1870 France and Germany had been bitter foes; and Germany, growing stronger and more prosperous, with a huge army and growing trade, resented her enemy, France, making a friend, especially a friend so powerful at sea. Thus the European powers were divided more sharply into two groups than they were before. Germany, Austria, and Italy had united in the Triple Alliance aimed at France and Russia. France had formed an offensive and defensive alliance with Russia, and these two grouped themselves with Britain as the Triple Entente. Britain and Russia were reconciled in the East; and Persia, which was in an unsettled condition, was divided into British and Russian spheres of influence. The restless policy of Germany showed itself in many directions. She encouraged Austria to meddle in the affairs of the Balkan States and to annex Bosnia—Bosnia is a Serb country with a Slav people—and this increased the fear Serbia had of Austrian designs against her, besides affronting Russia, which is the natural head of all Slav peoples. Germany also intrigued with Turkey, wishing to set her against Russia and against us, since we have many Mohammedans under our rule. She interfered in Morocco, trying to humiliate France; and she set to work to build a navy which would challenge our supremacy at sea.

The unexpected death in 1910 of King Edward VII was felt throughout the Empire almost as a personal bereavement. His sympathy with his people and his sincere efforts to promote their social well-being had greatly endeared him to the bulk of them; while his tact, his unassuming good nature, and his fairness had made him a favourite among foreigners. Edward, known admiringly as the "Peacemaker", lived in troublous times; but he was able to prevent the outbreak of the threatened hostilities during his lifetime.

Labour troubles, and earnest efforts by means of Health Insurance and other measures, and social legislation of various kinds marked the opening years of George V's reign. The passing of the Home Rule Bill for Ireland in 1914 was preceded by such a show of feeling in that country that civil war seemed almost unavoidable. Abroad the outlook was threatening. The German attempt to secure special privileges in Morocco failed in 1911. The Agadir incident, as it was called, actually led to the recognition of France's special claims in that country, and to the more complete isolation of the Central powers, Germany and Austria.

XL.—THE GREAT WAR AND AFTER.

All the German acts of provocation had been got over without a European war; and even when war did break out among the Balkan States, and Bulgaria, Serbia, and Greece allied against Turkey, and afterwards fought among themselves, peace was kept in Western Europe. But it was rapidly becoming clear that this would not last much longer: Germany meant war to come, and she believed that she was readier for it than her enemies were. So in the summer of 1914 came Austria's sudden ultimatum to Serbia which made demands that no State could grant; the Austrian declaration of war on Serbia; the mobilizing of armies by Austria, Russia, Germany, and France; the German ultimatum to Russia followed by a declaration of war; the violation of Belgian neutrality by the Germans, in spite of their own solemn treaty, which they called a "mere scrap of paper"; and the joining in of Britain (August, 1914) against a country which broke faith, and had—it is now clear—been planning to rob France of her colonies, to make herself mistress of Europe, and to overthrow the British Empire.

When in 1839 Belgium was separated from the Netherlands, or rather when the treaty guaranteeing Belgian independence was signed, it was signed by the then five great European powers—Britain, France, Russia, Austria and Prussia. The defeat of France in 1870 had caused that country to so strengthen the defences on her Eastern frontier that an invasion from the East seemed hopeless to the German staff. It was necessary, therefore, for Germany's success that her armies should pass through Belgium. The German Chancellor acknowledged that it was wrong, but fell back upon the argument that "Necessity knows no law." At midnight on 4th August, the Germans having refused to withdraw their invading armies from Belgium, Britain declared war on Germany.

The Violation of Belgian Territory.

It was hoped that the Belgian fortresses Liège and Namur would delay the Germans, but before the overwhelming numbers and the destructive power of the German guns, the Belgian War begins. fortress crumpled up, and by 15th August, that is in about ten days from the beginning of the struggle, Liège and its forts surrendered. Five days later, on the 20th of August, the Germans occupied Brussels; and following their usual war methods levied from the city a sum of £8,000,000 sterling. The French army, which formed the right of the allied line, was attacked at Charleroi, defeated and forced to retreat, leaving the flank of the British force on the left unprotected, so, though the British repelled all the German assaults in the battle of Mons, they too, were compelled to retreat; a stand by the British at Le Cateau, though it was costly taught the enemy restraint; but the British and French were forced to continue their retreat until the Marne was crossed and the enemy were almost within sight of Paris.

As they fell back the Allied line grew steadily stronger. With Paris on their left and Nancy on their right their flanks could not be turned. Battle of the Marne. On the 6th of September the battle of the Marne began, and on the 10th the Germans retreated. Foch had smashed the German centre and there was nothing else for them to do. The German right fell back over thirty miles and the centre nearly fifty. A week later, 13th September, the first battle of the Aisne began, and the Germans took up their position in the trenches which had been carefully prepared during their advance on Paris. The position of the various Allied armies was now changed. The British army was placed on the left of the Allied line next to the Belgians, who still held tenaciously the small corner of south-west Flanders which they had retained after the capture of Antwerp and their forced retreat towards France. The cruelties inflicted by the Germans on the unfortunate Belgians roused against them the indignation of the civilized world, and the youth of Britain volunteered for the new Volunteers. armies in large numbers, while the British colonies all over the world came enthusiastically to the help of the Homeland. Hatred of the methods followed by the Germans increased as the war proceeded; and the British self-governing colonies and Japan took the sundry colonial possessions Germany had acquired during the previous forty years.

Before the close of the first month of war, Admiral Beatty sank three German cruisers in the Bight of Heligoland; but a British naval force under Naval Warfare. Sir Christopher Cradock was defeated about a month later, on 1st November, off Coronel on the coast of Chile, and two British ships, the Good Hope and the Monmouth, were sunk. Admiral Sturdee was at once sent out with an adequate force, and he completely defeated Von Spee off the Falkland Islands on 8th December. Considerable damage was done to British shipping and commerce by German raiders, the most noted of which was the Emden, which was sunk by the Australian ship Sydney on 9th November, 1914.

Having secured the northern part of the coast of West Flanders, including Zeebrugge and Ostend, the Germans made these the headquarters of the submarines with which they proceeded to attack British shipping in the Channel and North Sea, while their fleets made raids on the coast of Britain, bombarding unfortified towns on the sea coast. To prevent ships coming to Britain with supplies, they attacked on the high seas ships of neutral nations. The only restraint on the harm they tried to do was their want of power.

In the East the Russians, though utterly unprepared, attacked the Austrian province of Galicia and the German province of East Prussia. The Germans had to hurry troops from the West to the East and so lighten their pressure on the Allied line in France. At length they inflicted on the Russians a crushing defeat at Tannenberg; but the Russian diversion had served its purpose, and the Germans, confessing failure, had to try new plans. Austria was defeated by the Russians, and the Austrian invasion of Poland repulsed.

After the battle of the Aisne the British army was transported to Flanders, where it was nearer its base and sorely needed to protect the Channel ports. The first battle of Ypres reached its most crucial stage on 31st October. The flower of the British army, though outnumbered by four to one, was able by a supreme effort to hold the line against repeated attacks. So ably did the British soldiers handle their rifles that the Germans thought that some new type of machine-gun had been brought into action. After three more weeks of exhausting effort the Flanders mud put an end for the time being to the struggle for the Channel ports, and the whole Western front became more or less stabilized for the winter. In the Balkans the Serbians had met with both success and failure. In the Battle of the Ridges, however, on 3rd December, they wiped out a whole field army of Austrians. Early in November Turkey openly declared herself on the side of the Central Powers.

In the year 1915 Germany made a colossal effort against Russia. Mackensen delivered a series of smashing blows which cost Russia some two million men and carried the war far into her own country, besides sowing the seeds of intrigue and revolt which were destined to yield their sanguinary harvest two years later. Bulgaria joined the Central Powers in October, 1915, and helped them to stab her neighbour Serbia in the back. The Serbians were overwhelmed by numbers and forced to flee, and Montenegro was abandoned to the Central Powers without resistance. One bright spot in the dark year of 1915 was that Italy came into the war on the side of the Allies. On the Western Front the battle of Neuve Chapelle was in part an experimental action; its success was spoilt by the lack of ammunition. The second battle of Ypres was an appalling battle, notorious for the introduction of poison-gas warfare by the Germans, and famous for the heroic part played by the Canadians. The battle of Festubert in May was indecisive, and the war seemed to be developing into a war of attrition. The battle of Loos in September ended in the capture of some German positions at the cost of a disproportionately large number of men. Before the end of the year Sir John French resigned the command of the British Expeditionary Force; he was succeeded by Sir Douglas Haig.

There were comparatively few naval engagements of outstanding importance in 1915. Early in the year The War at Sea, 1915. Beatty routed a German reconnoitring force off the Dogger Bank. The Germans proclaimed a submarine blockade of the British Isles in February, and in May crowned their record by sinking the Cunard liner Lusitania. This was the first of the series of German crimes which two years later brought America into the war.

The year 1915 also witnessed the disastrous Gallipoli expedition. British troops landed on 25th April; the "Anzacs" (Australian and New Zealand Army Corps) specially distinguished themselves. The Turkish positions were practically impregnable, and the British suffered much from lack of water and from unsatisfactory staff work. The expedition was withdrawn on 19th December, after more than 30,000 men had been killed.

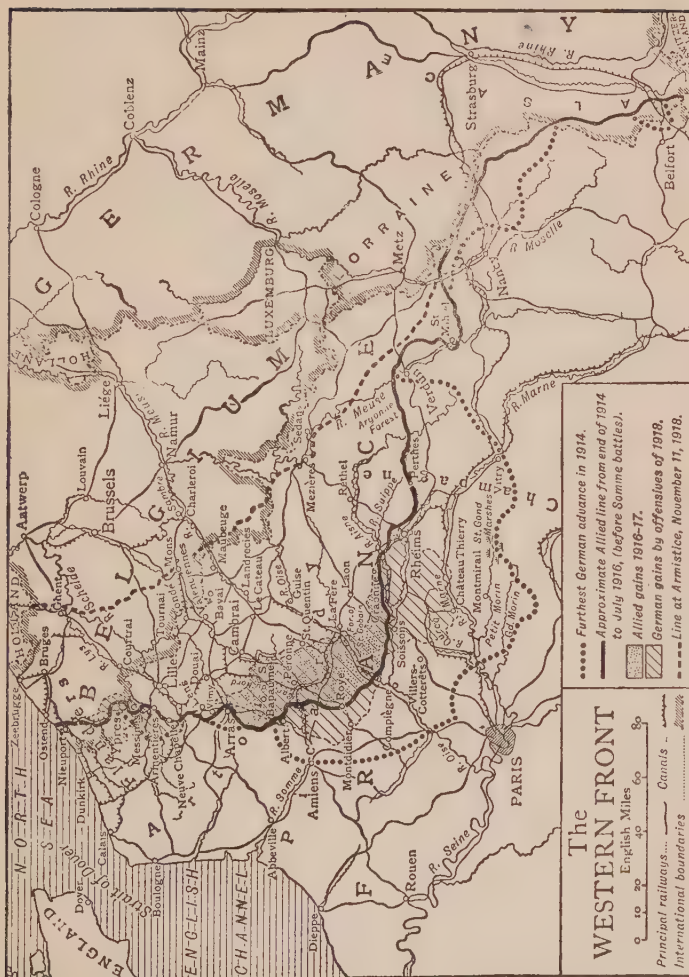

In 1916 the fiercest fighting on the Western Front raged round Verdun which the Germans attacked repeatedly after terrific bombardments, Battles of 1916. and which the French defended with the utmost gallantry. The British campaign on the Somme opened on 1st July; it was undertaken mainly to relieve the pressure on the French. The attack was pushed with the utmost bravery and determination, but could make no appreciable headway against unbroken German defences. Tanks were first used on 15th September, but though they won many positions the promise of a decisive victory gradually faded away, and winter put a stop to operations. The Russians made an astonishing recovery in 1916, and the situation became so serious for the Central Powers that Ludendorff was sent to take matters in hand. He succeeded in stemming the tide, largely with the aid of Bolshevist propaganda. In the Balkans, Roumania joined the Allies, but she was out-manceuvred and utterly defeated by Mackensen and Falkenhayn.

The outstanding naval event of 1916—indeed of all the war—was the battle of Jutland on 31st May. This battle has been a subject of controversy ever since it was fought. There is no doubt that the German fleet was defeated, but it was not so thoroughly defeated as it might have been, and Admiral Scheer, thanks to a chemically created smoke-screen, managed to escape with the loss of one battleship, one battle-cruiser, four light cruisers, and five destroyers. The German fleet only once left the vicinity of the Heligoland Bight after the Battle of Jutland, when it retired before it got into contact with the British fleet. The next trip of the High Seas Fleet towards the British coast was for the purpose of surrendering.

The chief events of 1917 were the entry of America into the war (5th April) and the revolution in Russia. The Tsar abdicated on 15th March, 1917, and was cruelly done to death with his entire family on 16th July, 1918. From July, 1917, Russia was for all practical purposes out of the war, and a treaty between the Germans and the Bolsheviks was signed at Brest-Litovsk on 3rd March, 1918. Greece, ere this, however, had declared herself on the side of the Allies (12th June), and King Constantine abdicated. In the autumn the Italians suffered a severe defeat at Caporetto, and British and French divisions were at once rushed from France through the Alps. On the Western front the Germans upset the Allies' plans by withdrawing on the Somme to the Hindenburg line. The battle of Arras (begun 9th April) and the second battle of the Aisne (begun 16th April) were only partial successes, and the French army, strained to breaking point by its heroic sacrifices, was unable to carry out its plans. The Battle of Messines (9th June) was a complete British victory, and prepared the way for the dreadful series of operations known as the Third Battle of Ypres (31st July). The German machine-gun strongholds, known as "pill-boxes", held up the British advance, but fighting under almost impossible conditions continued until November, when torrential rains rendered further progress impossible. A surprise attack at Cambrai on 20th November was highly successful, mainly owing to the tanks, but a German counter-attack on 30th November recaptured most of the hard-won positions. In 1918 the Germans made their final desperate bid for victory. Their great attack was launched on 21st March, and they ultimately advanced to within a dozen miles of Amiens, but their attack gradually spent its force and they were held. Their only chance of victory lay in rapid success, and when they failed to secure this the tide slowly but surely turned. The 18th July marked the turning point. From then on the Allies won victory after victory, and Marshal Foch, who was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Allied armies on 14th April, dealt the Germans blow after blow, until to avoid complete disaster, they sought for an armistice, which was granted on 11th November. The Kaiser fled to Holland, and Herr Ebert, an ex-saddler, became first president of the German Republic. Bulgaria had signed an armistice on 30th September, and Austria, whose armies had been routed by the Italians under General Diaz, dropped out of the war on November 3rd. The dark hours of early 1918 were brightened by the heroic naval raids on Zeebrugge and Ostend. Allenby, in the last year of the war, won a series of brilliant victories in Palestine. He destroyed three Turkish armies in less than a week, and obliged the Turks to sign an armistice on 30th October. The terms of the armistice with Germany included, besides evacuation of all conquered territory, the surrender of the bulk of the German navy, 5000 additional guns, 30,000 machine-guns, 3000 trench-mortars, and 2000 aeroplanes.

In December, 1918, a general election took place, and the Coalition Government of Mr. Lloyd George was returned by a large majority. By the Representation of the People Act, passed earlier in the year, eight million people (including six million women) had been given a vote. In 1922 the Coalition Government resigned, and after a general election, Mr. Bonar Law took office. He was compelled by ill-health to resign in May, 1923, and was succeeded by Mr. Stanley Baldwin. Mr. Baldwin appealed to the country in December, 1923, on the issue of Protection for Trade. The Conservatives failed to gain a majority over the combined Liberal and Labour parties, and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald became the first Labour Premier. After holding office for nine months Mr. MacDonald appealed to the country, and in the General Election which ensued the Conservatives won a decisive victory, and Mr. Baldwin again became Premier.

SYNOPSIS

I.—EARLY TIMES

Before the Roman invasion Britain was inhabited by people belonging to the Celtic group of humanity, akin to the Gauls.

They practised agriculture and many ordinary industrial arts.

British, from which springs modern Welsh, was the prevailing language, though in the north, now Scotland, Gaelic was introduced from Ireland at a fairly early period.

British and Gaelic are both Celtic tongues.

(The Roman Occupation of Britain, 43 A.D.—410.

1. The people of Britain aided the people of Gaul in resistance to Rome, and Julius Cæsar crossed the Channel to show the power of Roman arms (55 B.C.). Curiosity about an almost unknown land, and desire to share in the wealth of its tin mines, also influenced the Romans.
2. But the Romans determined to annex Britain only in 43 A.D.
3. The northern limits of the Roman Province in Britain were fixed by Hadrian's Wall from the Solway to the Tyne, separating the province from the Caledonians and Picts of North Britain.
4. The most serious revolt of the Britons against Roman power was that of Queen Boadicea, who destroyed Colchester, St. Albans, and London.

5. Results of the Roman Occupation:

- (1) Country divided into provinces, and the country pacified.
- (2) Marshes drained, forests cleared, agriculture improved.
- (3) Towns built—Eboracum (York), Lindum (Lincoln), Londinium (London), Aquæ Solis (Bath), &c.

- (4) Numerous public buildings—theatres, baths, temples, and villas for private individuals.
- (5) Great roads constructed for military and commercial purposes.
- (6) Roman dress, manners, and languages adopted by upper classes.
- (7) Christianity introduced.
6. Traces of Roman occupation still found in Britain:
 - (1) Remains of camps, roads, temples, baths, pottery, &c.
 - (2) Latin words in place-names like Doncaster, Winchester, Gloucester (Lat. castra, a camp), Lincoln (Lat. colonia, a settlement), Portsmouth (Lat. portus, a harbour).

ii. The English Invasion of Britain, 449–547.

1. The new invaders, who came from the northern shores of Germany, included:
 - (1) Jutes, from Jutland or Denmark.
 - (2) Angles, from Schleswig-Holstein.
 - (3) Saxons, from the basin of the Lower Elbe.

The Britons called them all Saxons; they are often called Anglo-Saxons.
2. The Britons were forced to retire to the high lands of:
 - (1) West Wales—Cornwall and Devonshire.
 - (2) North Wales—modern Wales.
 - (3) Strathclyde, or Cumbria—between the Ribble and the Clyde, and west of the Pennine Range.
3. In North Britain there still remained outside the Roman Province:

- (1) The kingdom of the Picts, north of the Forth and east of the Grampians.

664.

- (2) The kingdom of the Scots, immigrants from Ireland in the Highlands and Western Islands.
4. The nature of the English Conquest.
- (1) The English Conquest—a national migration, establishing a new language and new institutions. Thus very different from the Roman Conquest, which was a military occupation.
 - (2) Christianity disappeared with the settlement of the heathen newcomers.
 - (3) English kingdoms were founded as the country was wrested from the Celts.
5. The old English kingdoms consisted socially of:
- (1) A King (A.S. cuning), elected at first by the folk-moot or assembly of freemen, and later by the witan or assembly of wise men.
 - (2) The Eorlas, or nobles.
 - (3) The Ceorls, or simple freemen, land-owners.
 - (4) The Theowas, or slaves, some of whom were Britons.
6. The system of self-government established by the English involved:
- (1) The town-moot, presided over by the town-reeve or governor, for each township or village.
 - (2) The hundred-moot, presided over by the hundredes-ealdor (elder), and composed of members from groups of townships.
 - (3) The folk-moot, or assembly of the whole folk or people.
 - (4) The Witan, or council of wise men, a sort of inner council of the folk-moot, and somewhat resembling our House of Lords.

II.—THE COMING OF CHRISTIANITY

1. The chief points to be noted are:
- (1) The English settlers were heathens, worshipping Woden and Thor.
 - (2) The Mission of St. Augustine sent by Pope Gregory the Great, 597.
 - (3) Kent was the first, and Sussex the last kingdom to become Christian.
 - (4) St. Aidan from Iona, to which Christianity was brought by Columba from Ireland, established a monastery at Lindisfarne.

- (5) The Synod of Whitby, held to consider the differences between the Roman and the Celtic Christian churches, decided in favour of the Roman practice.
2. Results of the Conversion of the English to Christianity and of a united church:
- (1) The Archbishop of Canterbury—Primate of all England—divided the country into dioceses or sees, supervised by bishops; later on, parish boundaries were fixed.
 - (2) A united church helped to a united nation.
 - (3) The new religion offered an example not only of union, but of peace and a higher morality.
 - (4) The beginnings of English learning were due to the church:
 - i. Caedmon, the first English poet, was a monk in the Abbey at Whitby.
 - ii. Bede—"the venerable Bede"—our first historian, lived and taught in the monastery at Jarrow-upon-Tyne.
 - iii. Dunstan, scholar and statesman, became Archbishop of Canterbury.

III.—THE UNION OF ENGLAND

i. The Rise of Wessex:

1. Three of the old English kingdoms—Northumbria, Mercia, Wessex—became in turn more powerful than all the others.
2. The title of Bretwalda, or overlord, was taken by seven of the kings before Egbert.
3. Egbert, king of Wessex, as overlord, was crowned king of the English.

ii. The Danish Invasions:

The English kingdoms were forced to unite to repel a new enemy—the Danes.

The Danes, also known as Norsemen, Northmen (Normans in France), and Vikings, began to make inroads on England in 787.

The Danish Invasions passed through two stages:

- (1) The stage of plunder.
 - (2) The stage of settlement.
- They became masters of all England except Wessex.

iii. The Hero-King of Wessex:

1. Alfred was great not only as a king, but as

(1) A Warrior: he helped to win the battle of Ashdown; won Ethandune; forced the Danes to surrender at Chippenham.

(2) A Statesman: he concluded the Treaty of Wedmore, giving to the Danes England east of Watling Street; he laid the foundation of England's naval power; he reformed the laws.

(3) A Teacher: he was a famous scholar; established schools; translated books into English; ordered the making of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

2. His sons and grandsons gradually restored Saxon sway over the Danes.

IV.—THE FALL OF THE SAXONS

i. The Golden Age of Saxon England.

1. From 800 to 978 was a period of great kings, and one great statesman—Dunstan.

2. The period of disunion and weakness that followed was marked by:

(1) The institution of the Danegeld.

(2) The Massacre of St. Brice's Day.

(3) The reign of three Danish kings over England, 1017–1042.

ii. The Norman Invasion.

1. The causes that led up to the Norman invasion:

(1) The favour shown to Normans by Edward the Confessor.

(2) His making Normans earls, bishops, &c., in England.

(3) His giving a promise to leave the crown to William, duke of Normandy.

(4) The oath sworn by Harold when a prisoner in Normandy.

2. Leading events:

(1) Harold defeated Tostig and the Northmen at Stamford Bridge, 1066

(2) William landed at Pevensey.

(3) William was defeated and slain at Senlac, near Hastings, 1066.

V.—NORMANS AND ENGLISH: FEUDALISM

1. William the Conqueror was King of England:

(1) By right of conquest.

(2) By right afterwards of election by the Witan.

2. William's policy was:

(1) To subdue the English thoroughly.

(2) To keep the Normans from revolting.

(3) To establish Feudalism in England.

3. The change in the system of land tenure was effected.

(1) By confiscating the lands of all the English who fought for Harold.

(2) By making the other English land-owners do homage.

Thus the king became, in name, owner of all the land.

4. The Feudal System.

(1) The king was sole owner of all land.

(2) The king granted estates to his nobles and barons—tenants-in-chief.

(3) The tenants-in-chief granted smaller estates to sub-tenants.

(4) Below the free tenants were the serfs or villeins.

(5) Each lord had jurisdiction over his own vassals.

(6) Vassals could be called on to fight for their lords.

5. To maintain strong rule over his kingdom, William

(1) Gave the barons large estates, but broken up into scattered portions

(2) Made all tenants swear obedience at Salisbury, to the king first and to the lords after.

(3) Caused the Domesday Survey of England to be made.

6. William I's dangers came from:

(1) The English, who rebelled against him.

(2) The dissatisfied Norman barons, who rebelled also.

(3) His own sons, who were allied with France against him.

VI.—THE WORST EVILS OF FEUDALISM, ETC.

The chief points to be noted in this chapter are:

1. The people feared the barons more than they feared the king.

2. The civil war between the followers of Stephen and Matilda.

3. The cruelties of the barons—"nineteen long winters".

4. The curbing of the powers of the barons by Henry II.
5. The growing power of the church.
6. The king's law and the church's law.
7. Becket's defence of churchmen's privileges.
8. Henry's failure to make the law supreme over churchmen—mainly owing to the murder of Becket, 1170.

VII.—RICHARD THE CRUSADER

i. Henry II's dominions included:

- (1) England and Wales.
- (2) Overlordship of Ireland.
- (3) Overlordship of Scotland in virtue of William the Lion's homage. This was abandoned by his son Richard I.
- (4) The west of France from the English Channel to the Pyrenees. England was now a great Continental Power.

2. Richard the Crusader.

- (1) The object of the Crusades was to free the Holy Land from the Saracens.
- (2) The special object of the Third Crusade was to capture Jerusalem from Saladin.
- (3) Richard captured Acre, but was forced to retreat from Jerusalem.
- (4) On his way home Richard was imprisoned in Austria.
- (5) Richard was ransomed, but was killed in a war with France.

VIII.—MAGNA CARTA

i. Chief points to be noted in John's reign.

1. The loss of his French possessions. (He had been nicknamed "Lackland" in his youth, no territory having been assigned to him by his father.)
2. His quarrel with the pope.
 - (1) Dispute arose over the election of Archbishop of Canterbury.
 - (2) England was laid under interdict by the pope.
 - (3) John was excommunicated.
 - (4) Philip II of France was ordered by the pope to carry out John's deposition.

(5) John submitted, and the pope's nominee, Stephen Langton, became archbishop.

3. The revolt of the barons.

- (1) The barons, headed by Langton, met to consider grievances.
- (2) Against John were united the barons, the clergy, and the citizens of the towns.
- (3) John was compelled to sign at Runnimeade Magna Carta, the Great Charter [1215], the foundation-stone of English liberties and of the English Constitution.

ii. Magna Carta. 1215.

The two main provisions of Magna Carta were:

1. That the king may not take money unless Parliament grants it to him.
2. That no man is to be punished without a trial by his equals.

NOTE.—This document has been confirmed by Act of Parliament thirty-two times.

iii. The Makings of Parliament.

1. The Great Council of the Norman kings and the early Plantagenets became Parliament in the reign of Henry III.
2. Parliament in its modern form is mainly owing to the influence of Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester.
3. The Mad Parliament drew up the Provisions of Oxford:
 - (1) The power of the king should be transferred to a council of fifteen barons.
 - (2) Four knights should represent the freeholders of every country.
 - (3) Sheriffs should be elected annually by vote.
 - (4) Parliament should meet three times a year.
4. After the Battle of Lewes Simon summoned another Parliament [1265], which, like the Scots Parliament, contained:
 - (1) Lords.
 - (2) County members.
 - (3) Borough members.
5. The Parliament of Edward I—"The Model Parliament" [1295]—also included knights of the shire and citizens from the towns.

IX.—THE BEGINNINGS OF SCOTLAND

1. The divisions of Scotland.

The Scots of Ireland formed settlements in the west of Caledonia, and eventually occupied most of the south-west. Thus before the Norman Conquest of England there were:

- (1) The land of the Picts, north of the Forth.
- (2) The kingdom of the Scots, in Argyleshire.
- (3) The kingdom of Strathclyde, from the Clyde to the Ribble.
- (4) The English district of Lothian, from the Forth to the Tees.

2. The Union was effected thus:

- (1) First, the Picts and the Scots were united under Kenneth Mac-Alpine in 843.
- (2) Next, the kings of Scots obtained rule over the northern part of Strathclyde.
- (3) Lothian, originally part of Northumbria and then a possession of the Danes, was, on the advice of Dunstan, given by King Edgar to Kenneth II.

3. The spread of the English language in Scotland:

- (1) Lothian was Saxon in speech and in law.
- (2) Malcolm Canmore, in consequence of long residence in England and of his marriage with Margaret, did much to spread English customs and speech in Scotland.
- (3) The Celtic reaction was successfully resisted by Malcolm's son, aided by Normans — Bruces, Byssets, Lindsays, Ramsays—who also settled in Scotland.

4. How the kings of England came to regard Scotland as subject to them:

- (1) William I of England invaded Scotland, and compelled Malcolm Canmore to do him homage.
- (2) Henry II forced Malcolm IV to do homage for the earldom of Huntingdon.
- (3) William the Lion, captured by the English near Alnwick, was compelled by the Treaty of Falaise (in Normandy) to do homage for Scotland, to hold his crown as a fief of the English throne.

(4) But Richard I released William I from his feudal obligation on receipt of 10,000 marks (£6666 $\frac{2}{3}$).—

X.—AN EARLY GREAT BRITAIN AND ITS FAILURE

Edward I aimed at a united British nation.

1. He conquered Wales, and bestowed on his son the title of Prince of Wales.
2. To unite the crowns of England and Scotland, he proposed a marriage between his son and Margaret, the "Maid of Norway".
3. The Scots consented, and on the death of Margaret asked Edward to decide the question of the succession between a large number of candidates, who agreed to accept his award.
4. Edward revived the claim of lordship over Scotland.
5. The Court held at Norham decided in favour of John Balliol, who accepted the throne as a vassal of England.
6. Balliol, refusing afterwards to obey, was dethroned, and Edward I treated Scotland as a forfeited fief.

XI.—THE STORY OF SCOTTISH INDEPENDENCE

Edward I, who had thus as he thought completed the conquest of Scotland, had now, however, to encounter the Scottish people in arms, and the national spirit gathered round:

1. Sir William Wallace.

- (1) He drove the English out of the Scottish castles.
- (2) He defeated the English at Stirling Bridge, 1297.
- (3) He was made Guardian of Scotland.
- (4) He was defeated by Edward I at Falkirk, 1298.
- (5) He was betrayed to Sir John Monteith, condemned, and executed in London, 1305.

2. Robert Bruce, grandson of Bruce, the rival of John Balliol.

- (1) He killed John Comyn, a rival for the throne, in Greyfriars Church, Dumfries.
- (2) He was crowned at Scone, and defeated immediately afterwards at Methven.

- (3) He took refuge for a winter in Rathlin Isle.
- (4) On the death of Edward I—the Hammer of the Scots—Bruce began to regain the castles—Roxburgh, Edinburgh, Linlithgow—and soon Stirling Castle alone held out.
- (5) To relieve Stirling Castle Edward II fought the Battle of Bannockburn—the battle which decided once for all that England could not conquer Scotland [1314].
- (6) Robert Bruce was recognized as king of Scotland, and the complete Independence of Scotland was acknowledged by the English Parliament, 1328.
- 3. The chief results of Bruce's reign:
 - (1) He obtained the mastery over all his foes at home and abroad.
 - (2) He began the Franco-Scottish Alliance.
 - (3) He created a united Scotland, proud of its race and its king.

XII.—THE HUNDRED YEARS' WAR, 1338–1453

- 1. The causes that led to the Hundred Years' War between England and France:
 - (1) The help—men, arms, and money—given by France to Scotland.
 - (2) Edward's wish to get hold of Flanders and Guienne—centres of the wool and wine trades.
 - (3) Edward's claim to the French crown.
- 2. The Great Divisions of the War:
 - (1) Period of success in the early part of Edward III's reign.
 - 1. The Battle of Sluys, 1340.
 - 2. The Battle of Cressy, 1346.
 - 3. The Battle of Poitiers, 1356.
 - 4. The Treaty of Bretigny, by which England obtained the whole S.W. of France.
 - (2) Period of failure in the latter part of Edward III's reign, and in Richard II's reign.
 - (3) Second period of success in the reign of Henry V.
 - 1. The Battle of Agincourt, 1415.
 - 2. The marriage of Henry V to Katharine of France.
 - 3. The crowning of Henry VI as King of France.

- 4. Battles of Crevant and Verneuil.
- (4) Second period of failure in the reign of Henry VI.
 - 1. The Siege of Orleans.
 - 2. The gradual loss of English possessions in France.
 - 3. All Frenah provinces lost, Calais alone remaining, 1453.
- 3. Success and failure.

The English victories were due

 - (1) To the skill of the English archers.
 - (2) To the fact that the day of knights in armour was past.
 - (3) In Henry V's day, to the disunion of France and the alliance between England and Burgundy.

The English failures were due

 - (1) To the difficulty of taking French walled towns.
 - (2) To the French keeping up continual warfare by small parties.
 - (3) To enthusiasm created by Jeanne Darc.

XIII.—THE BLACK DEATH AND THE SERFS

The chief points to be noted in connection with the cultivation of the land are:

- 1. Under Norman rule the land was cultivated by serfs, bound to the land, and obliged to give to their lords so many days' service each week.
- 2. In course of time serfs came to pay money instead of giving service.
- 3. The Black Death—1347 to 1350—which destroyed one-third of the people of England, resulted in
 - (1) A great scarcity of labourers.
 - (2) A sharp rise in prices.
 - (3) A corresponding rise in wages.
 - (4) Consequent hardship to the land-owners, who received only the old commuted money payments, but paid the new high wages.
- 4. Parliament passed the Statutes of Labourers to restore the rate of wages current in 1347.
- 5. The statutes proved a failure: prices rose, and men could not live on the old wages.
- 6. The land-owners then tried to revert to the labour service—villénage.
- 7. Great discontent resulted in
 - (1) A peasant revolt headed by Wat Tyler.

- (2) Some land-owners leasing their lands to tenants for a rent.
- (3) Some land-owners turning from arable-farming to sheep-farming.
- (4) Depopulation of the country, and the gradual disappearance of the serfs altogether as a class.

XIV.—WYCLIF AND THE LOLLARDS

1. Wyclif and the Lollards were Reformers more than a hundred years before the days of Luther.
2. The causes of wide-spread dislike of the Roman Catholic Church:
 - (1) A great deal of money was sent to Rome as taxes.
 - (2) Foreigners were appointed by the Pope to English livings, deaneries, and canonries.
 - (3) A few churchmen held many livings, which they utterly neglected.
 - (4) The wealth of these churchmen and their servants formed a contrast to the poverty of the parish priests.
3. Both the Dominican and the Franciscan Friars outlived their first duty—the teaching of the simple message of Christ.
4. "The Great Schism" divided the church into followers of the pope at Avignon and followers of the pope at Rome, and weakened the power of both.
5. John Wyclif
 - (1) Was the forerunner of the Reformation—"the morning star of the Reformation".
 - (2) He founded the order of "The Simple Priests".
 - (3) He translated the Bible from Latin into English.
 - (4) He taught the great Protestant doctrine of individual judgment—the right of all to form their ideas of conduct on their reading of the Bible.
6. The Lollard Movement
 - (1) Was a failure, because the Lollards had nothing definite to propose.
 - (2) It ceased to be an active force with the burning of Sir John Oldcastle in the reign of Henry V.

XV.—THE WARS OF THE ROSES, 1455-1485

1. The causes that led to the Wars of the Roses:
 - (1) The failure of the French war.

- (2) The rivalry of the two families—York and Lancaster.
- (3) The insanity of Henry VI.
- (4) Margaret's determination to fight for her son Edward's rights.

2. The main incidents of the wars:

- (1) Yorkist victories at St. Albans, Northampton, Mortimer's Cross, Towton, Hedgeley Moor, Hexham, Barnet, Tewkesbury.
 - (2) Lancastrian victories at Wakefield, St. Albans, and The Battle of Bosworth, 1485.
 - (3) Treachery and bloodshed on both sides.
 - (4) The power of Warwick the Kingmaker.
3. Results of the Wars of the Roses:
 - (1) Changes of dynasty.
 - (2) Almost total destruction of the nobility.
 - (3) Establishment of a strong independent monarchy relying on the middle classes.

XVI.—THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND. FIRST PERIOD

1. Henry VII strengthened the power of the throne:
 - (1) By refusing liveried retainers to the nobles, and by enforcing the laws against maintenance, or the mutual support of one another's law-suits.
 - (2) By amassing hoards of money.
 - (3) By marrying his children to foreign princes and princesses.
 1. His daughter Margaret to James IV of Scotland.
 2. His son (Arthur and then) Henry to Catharine of Aragon.
2. The Reformation in England was in part Political.
 - (1) Henry wished to divorce Catharine of Aragon.
 - (2) Pope Clement VII, fearing to offend her nephew, Charles V of Spain, refused his sanction.
 - (3) So Henry wished to break free from the pope, but not to become a Protestant.
 - (4) The Parliament of 1529—the Reformation Parliament—
 1. Declared that all appeals to the pope and appointments made by him were illegal.
 2. Ordered that no payments should be made to the pope.

3. Passed the Act of Supremacy, making the king "the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England".
- (5) But Henry was not
 1. A Roman Catholic, for he defied the pope and beheaded Catholics who did not take the Oath of Supremacy.
 2. A Protestant, for he held to all Roman Catholic doctrines.
3. Two notable results of the Reformation in England:
 - (1) The suppression of the monasteries.
 - (2) The translation of the Bible—Coverdale's Bible.

XVII.—THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND.

1. The Duke of Somerset, regent for Edward VI, went further than Henry VIII in religious matters.
 - (1) He abolished the mass and the Catholic form of service.
 - (2) He issued a new service in English.
 - (3) He caused images and pictures to be removed from the churches.
2. Northumberland, who was scheming to get the crown for his son's wife, Lady Jane Grey, carried the Reformation still further.
3. But Mary, herself half a Spaniard and married to a Spaniard, restored Roman Catholicism, and persecuted the Protestants—Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, and others perishing at the stake.
4. Once again, however, England became anti-Roman under Elizabeth, who was acknowledged head of the National Church.
5. But a small party—the Puritans—sought for further reforms, and the abolition of rites and vestments, &c.

XVIII.—THE UNLUCKY HOUSE OF STUART

1. The long troublous period covered by this chapter—1329 to 1542—was rendered gloomy:
 - (1) By wars and invasions,
 - (2) By minorities and quarrels at home,
 which impoverished the country and prevented her development.

2. The Wars included:

- (1) The defeat of the Scottish regent, Mar, at Dupplin, in 1332: David II.
 - (2) The defeat of the Scots by Edward III at Halidon Hill, in 1333: David II.
 - (3) The defeat of the English at Otterburn, 1388: Robert II.
 - (4) The disastrous defeat of the Scots at Flodden, in 1513: James IV.
 - (5) The rout of the Scots at Solway Moss, in 1542: James V.
3. The Struggle of the kings with the nobles was marked by:
 - (1) The starving, by Douglas of Liddesdale, of Ramsay of Dalwolsy in Hermitage Castle.
 - (2) The starving by Albany of the elder son of Robert III in Falkland Palace.
 - (3) The murder of James I by Sir Robert Graham in Blackfriars Abbey, Perth.
 - (4) The beheading of the Douglas brothers in Edinburgh Castle.
 - (5) The stabbing of Douglas by James II in Stirling Castle.
 - (6) The hanging of Cochran by Archibald Bell-the-cat at the Bridge of Lauder (James III).
 - (7) The battle of Sauchie Burn and the murder of James III in 1488.
 - (8) "Cleanse the Causeway", an affray between the Douglasses and the Hamiltons in the High Street of Edinburgh.
 - (9) The hanging of Johnnie Armstrong, the Border freebooter.

XIX.—THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND

1. The Reformation had begun in Scotland before Mary Stuart was sent to France.
 - (1) The Scottish Parliament (March, 1543) permitted the study of the Scriptures in English.
 - (2) As a consequence, men began to think the Roman Catholic Church wrong.
 - (3) Cardinal Beaton, like his predecessors, tried to stop the Reformation by burning the reformers among them George Wishart.
 - (4) Wishart's friends murdered Beaton and seized St. Andrew's Castle. But they were forced to surrender, and one of them, John Knox, was sent to the galleys.

- (5) Protestantism was in grave danger when Mary of Guise became regent.
- (6) Knox, however, stirred up the Reformers—Glencairn, Argyle, Morton—to lead the Protestant party.
- (7) Knox's preaching led to the destruction of:
 1. The images, pictures, and stained-glass windows of the churches.
 2. The churches and monasteries themselves.
- (8) Mary of Guise obtained French aid, but Elizabeth sent help to the Lords of the Congregation, with the result.
 1. That by the Treaty of Leith the French troops left Scotland. 1560
 2. That Scotland became Protestant.
2. The chief events in the reign of Mary, Queen of Scots, the Catholic queen of a Protestant people:
 - (1) Her marriage with her cousin, Lord Darnley.
 - (2) The murder of David Rizzio.
 - (3) The murder of Darnley.
 - (4) Her marriage with the Earl of Bothwell.
 - (5) The defeat of Bothwell at Carberry Hill.
 - (6) Her escape from confinement in Lochleven Castle.
 - (7) Her defeat at Langside and flight to England.

XX.—ROYAL MARRIAGES

1. The royal marriages of some centuries ago usually determined not only
 - (1) The foreign policy of a nation, but also
 - (2) The religion, its institutions, and even its separate existence.
 - (3) English destinies in the hands of three queens—Mary Tudor Elizabeth, Mary Stuart.
2. Important royal marriages.
 - (1) The marriage of Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII, led to the union of the crowns of England and Scotland in the person of James I.

- (2) The desire of Henry VIII to annul his marriage with Catharine of Aragon confirmed the Reformation in England.
- (3) The marriage of Mary Tudor to Philip II of Spain increased the severity of persecution, and might have led to England's falling into the hands of Spain. Fortunately no heir was born.
- (4) The marriage of Mary Stuart to Francis II of France knit closer the bonds of union between France and Scotland, but again there was no heir.
- (5) The marriage of Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I, to the Elector Palatine led to the accession of the house of Hanover in the person of George I.

XXI.—ELIZABETH AND THE ARMADA

1. The Greatness of Elizabeth's reign:

- (1) The English Church was firmly established.
- (2) The way was prepared for the union of England and Scotland.
- (3) Her reign was marked by important social legislation.
- (4) Her reign witnessed the noonday splendour of English literature—it was the age of Spenser and Shakespeare.
- (5) Britain's supremacy at sea was established.
- (6) The beginnings of a "Greater Britain" beyond the seas were attempted.

2. England and Spain.

- (1) The old hatred of France was transferred to Spain.
- (2) Elizabeth's reign was one long war with Spain.
- (3) The war with Spain was carried on in the Spanish Main by the "Adventurers"—Hawkins, Drake, and other "sea-dogs".
- (4) The failure of the Invincible Armada not only freed England from all fear of invasion, but taught her that England's first line of defence must ever be—the Navy.

XXII.—THE STUARTS AND THEIR DIFFICULTIES

i. King and Parliament:

The Stuart kings and their Parliaments quarrelled over

(1) Religion at home.

1. James, though brought up as a Presbyterian, wished to be head of the Church of England; his claim was disagreeable to Catholics, Puritans, and Presbyterians.
2. The Gunpowder Plot, followed by severe laws against the Catholics.

(2) Religious matters abroad.

1. James I wished his son to marry the Infanta of Spain—a Catholic.
2. Charles I married Henrietta Maria of France—a Catholic.
These two plans were unpopular with the Protestant party.
3. Elizabeth Stuart married the Elector Palatine, leader of the German Protestants.
4. Charles I tried to help the French Protestants.

These two policies would have been popular, but both ended in failure.

(3) The right of the king to take money and govern without Parliament.

1. The Stuarts held that kings rule by divine right.
2. James I and Charles I tried to override Parliament by use of the "Royal Prerogative".

3. But the Parliaments were resolved.

1. To prevent the king's raising money on his own authority.
2. To make his ministers responsible for what was done.

4. Parliament enforced these resolutions.

1. By making James I promise to give up grants of monopolies.

2. By giving Charles I certain taxes for only two years instead of for life.

3. By forcing Charles I to accept the Petition of Right, the two chief clauses of which were:

a. That to take taxes except by leave of Parliament was illegal.

b. That no one should be kept in prison by command of the king without trial.

4. By impeaching—that is, the Commons accused before the Lords as judges—Bacon, Middlesex, Buckingham, and other royal favourites.

ii. The Eleven Years' Tyranny.

1. Charles, advised by Laud, ruled arbitrarily.
2. Wentworth ruled as president of the council of the north, and afterwards as lord-deputy in Ireland.
3. Ship-money was illegally levied.
4. The Court of Star Chamber fined those who spoke or wrote against the king.
5. The High Commission Court dealt similarly with the Puritans.
6. Archbishop Laud ruled the affairs of the church.
7. Riot in Edinburgh caused by enforcing the use of the liturgy prepared by royal authority for the Church of Scotland.
8. The National Covenant bound the Scots to defend the Scottish form of service.
9. The Bishops' War was the first step in the downfall of the king, because the extra expense of a war compelled Charles again to summon Parliament.

XXIII.—WAR BETWEEN KING AND PARLIAMENT

i. The Long Parliament [1640] finally dissolved 1660.

1. Pym and Hampden were bent on reform.
2. Strafford impeached and beheaded.
3. Star Chamber and High Commission Court abolished.
4. Charles tried to arrest Pym, Hampden, and three others—the immediate cause of Civil War.

ii. The Civil War:

1. The Royalists successful.
2. The Parliament successful.

(1) Victory at Marston Moor, due to the Scots and Cromwell's iron-sides, 1644.

- (2) The New Model army formed by Cromwell, the champion of the Sects, who desired liberty to worship as they pleased and were opposed to the Presbyterians.
- (3) Victory at Naseby, 1645.
- 3. Charles in the hands of his enemies.
 - (1) In Scotland Montrose won a series of victories over the Covenanters.
 - (2) But he was defeated by Leslie at Philiphaugh, 1645.
 - (3) Charles surrendered to the Scots, who in turn gave him up to Parliament.
 - (4) The trial and execution of Charles I was the work of the Independents headed by Cromwell.
- 4. Reasons for the failure of Charles I in the Civil War:
 - (1) His want of money to carry on a protracted war.
 - (2) The genius of Cromwell and the religious zeal of his Ironsides.
 - (3) Want of agreement among the king's officers.
 - (4) The help given to the Parliamentary army by the Scots.

XXIV.—BRITAIN GOVERNED BY AN ARMY

- 1. The Commonwealth was established in 1649, but Charles I's son was recognized as king in
 - (1) Ireland, where
 - 1. Cromwell subdued the country and sacked Drogheda.
 - 2. Cromwell abolished the Irish Parliament—members to be sent to Westminster.
 - (2) Scotland, where
 - 1. Montrose was defeated, and was executed by his enemy, Argyle.
 - 2. Cromwell defeated David Leslie and the Covenanters at Dunbar, 1650.
 - 3. Cromwell ravaged Fifeshire.
- 2. Charles's army was defeated at Worcester, and he escaped to France.
- 3. Monk subdued Scotland and abolished the Scottish Parliament—members to be sent to Westminster.
- 4. Quarrels between the English Parliament and the Independent Army.
 - (1) Colonel Pride had already "purged" Parliament of the leading Presbyterian members.

- (2) Cromwell dissolved the "Rump", as the body consisting of the fifty to sixty remaining members was called.
- (3) Cromwell's own Parliaments—including the "Barebone's Parliament"—unsuccessful.
- 5. Cromwell became a despot, ruling by means of the army and without the sanction of a Parliament for his doings.
- 6. Abroad, Cromwell made peace with the Dutch, and an alliance with Sweden and Denmark. He also formed an alliance with France, the enemy of Spain.
- 7. On the death of Cromwell, Monk declared for a free Parliament, which meant
 - (1) That military despotism was ended.
 - (2) The Restoration of Charles II.

XXV.—FROM RESTORATION TO REVOLUTION

The second struggle between King and Parliament was marked by:

1. In Charles II's reign:

- (1) Parliament—the Cavalier Parliament—at first supporting the king.
- (2) The Clarendon Code—intended to drive Presbyterianism from Church and State.
- (3) The presence of a Dutch fleet in the Thames.
- (4) The Cabal Ministry—favourable to toleration and the strengthening of the royal prerogative.
- (5) A Declaration of Indulgence issued by Charles.
 - 1. It abolished the penal laws against both Catholics and Non-conformists.
 - 2. All Protestants were united against it.
 - 3. Parliament compelled Charles to withdraw the declaration.
- (6) The Test Act, requiring all persons holding office to take the sacrament according to the rites of the Established Church.
- (7) The Popish Plot and the Popish Terror.
- (8) The failure of the Exclusion Bill—a bill to exclude James, Duke of York, from succeeding to the throne.

2. In James's Reign.

- (1) The Rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth and the Battle of Sedgemoor.
 - (2) The Bloody Assizes.
 - (3) The Declaration of Indulgence, and the suspension of the penal laws against Roman Catholics.
 - (4) The Trial of the Seven Bishops for petitioning against having to read the Declaration of Indulgence.
 - (5) The birth of a son to the king—known afterwards as "The Old Pretender".
 - (6) The landing of William of Orange—nephew and son-in-law of James—and James's flight to France; the Revolution, 1688.
3. The causes of the Revolution:
- (1) James's disregard of the penal laws against Catholics.
 - (2) The violation of the Test Act.
 - (3) His attacks on the Universities.
 - (4) The trial of the Seven Bishops.

XXVI.—WILLIAM III IN BRITAIN

1. Opposition to William and Mary arose.

(1) In Scotland:

1. Viscount Dundee defeated General Mackay at Killiecrankie.
2. The Massacre of Glencoe.
3. The other Highland clans were Jacobites because the Campbells supported William.

(2) In Ireland.

1. The Irish fought for James because he was a Catholic.
 2. The Protestants were besieged in Londonderry and Enniskillen.
 3. William defeated James in the Battle of the Boyne.
 4. The Treaty of Limerick closed the war.
2. The Revolution settled the supremacy of Parliament for ever, and brought in government by party.
3. The Bill of Rights declared
- (1) That it was illegal for the king to set aside the laws, to levy money, or to keep a standing army without consent of Parliament.
 - (2) That Parliament should be freely elected, and should have freedom of debate.
 - (3) That no Catholic could be king.

XXVII.—A SECOND HUNDRED YEARS' WAR WITH FRANCE

1. The long war with France was really a struggle for possession of the New World and India.
2. William was at war with France:
 - (1) Because France was the leader of Catholicism.
 - (2) Because France was threatening all Europe.
 - (3) Because France was specially dangerous to Holland.
 - (4) Because it seemed as if France and Spain were to be united under the grandson of Louis
3. The English people were at war with France because Louis XIV supported James II.
4. The war in William's reign was neither very popular nor very successful, and ended with the Peace of Ryswick.
5. The war in Anne's reign was popular and brilliantly successful
 - (1) Marlborough in 1704 won the Battle of Blenheim—one of the great decisive battles in the world's history: it saved Austria from destruction.
 - (2) He also won the battles—Ramilles, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet in the Low Countries.
 - (3) The war was closed by the Treaty of Utrecht, which gave to Britain:
 1. Two ports in the Mediterranean—Gibraltar and Minorca.
 2. Two colonies in the New World—Nova Scotia and St. Kitt's.
 3. The sole right of shipping slaves to the Spanish colonies.

XXVIII.—THE UNION OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND

1. Obstacles to the Union of the Parliaments:

- (1) The religious and commercial jealousies of the two countries.
- (2) Fears of the Scots for the independence of their country.
- (3) The strength of the Jacobite party in Scotland.
- (4) Resentment at the failure of the Darien Scheme, ruined by:
 1. The unhealthy climate.
 2. The jealousy of both the English and the Spanish.

(5) This discontent led the Scots to pass the Act of Security to prevent the succession as in England, unless Scottish trade and religion were fully recognized.

(6) The English retaliated and threatened

1. To treat the Scots as foreigners.
2. To admit no Scottish goods into England.
3. To fortify Carlisle, Newcastle, Berwick, and Hull.

2. Act of Union of England and Scotland.

This act included twenty - five Articles.

- (1) Establishing one Parliament for the two countries.
- (2) Giving every security to the Scottish law and church.
- (3) Opening up English trade to the Scots.

XXIX.—THE 'FIFTEEN AND THE 'FORTY-FIVE

i. The 'Fifteen.

1. The object of this rising was to overthrow the Hanoverian dynasty, and to place the Old Pretender on the throne.
2. The chief events connected with the 'Fifteen:
 - (1) Risings in Scotland under the Earl of Mar and Lord Kenmure.
 - (2) Rising in Northumberland under Mr. Foster and Lord Derwentwater.
 - (3) The English Jacobites surrendered at Preston.
 - (4) A drawn battle between Mar and Argyle was fought at Sheriffmuir.
3. Results of the rising:
 - (1) Derwentwater and Kenmure were executed.
 - (2) Severe laws against the Catholics were re-enacted.
 - (3) The Septennial Act was passed.

ii The 'Forty-five:

1. Opportunity for the rising of the 'Forty-five was provided by the defeat of British troops at Fontenoy.
2. The chief events connected with the 'Forty-five.
 - (1) Charles's march upon Perth and Edinburgh.
 - (2) The rout of Cope's army at Prestonpans.

(3) Charles's march into England as far as Derby.

(4) Charles's victory at Falkirk.

(5) The total defeat of the Highlanders at Culloden.

(6) Charles's romantic wanderings and escape to France.

3. Results of the 'Forty-five.

- (1) Many Jacobites were executed or transported.
- (2) The Stuart cause was utterly and hopelessly lost.
- (3) Acts were passed to prevent further trouble in the Highlands:
 1. The Disarming Act.
 2. An Act to put an end to the authority of the chiefs over their clans.
 3. An Act forbidding the wearing of tartan or the Highland garb.

XXX.—GREATER BRITAIN

i. Pitt and the Empire:

1. The hostility to France.

- (1) Britain took part in three great wars in the middle of the eighteenth century. In each her chief antagonist was France. General causes of these wars are twofold:
 1. Attempts of France to extend her power in Europe.
 2. Rivalry between Britain and France (with her ally Spain) on colonial questions.
- (2) It was therefore British policy to take part with all France's enemies on the Continent in order to prevent her putting forth her full power in colonial struggles.
- (3) The possession of Hanover made our Hanoverian kings further inclined to involve Britain in German affairs.

2. The Three Great Wars:

- (1) The War of the Austrian Succession, 1739-1748.
 1. Immediate cause—France and Spain repudiated the Pragmatic Sanction and Frederick the Great attacked Silesia.
 2. Combatants—Britain, Austria, and Holland against France, Spain, Prussia, Bavaria.
 3. Events—The French defeated at Dettingen; the British defeated at Fontenoy.
 4. War closed temporarily by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

(2) The Seven Years' War, 1756-63.

1. Causes of the War—French alarm at the power of Prussia; English anxiety about Hanover; English and French colonial rivalry.

2. In Europe Frederick of Prussia was hard pressed by Austria, France, and Russia in alliance against him. He was more than once nearly driven from his throne, but managed in the end to keep Silesia. He won great battles at Rossbach and Leuthen, while the British troops sent by Pitt were victorious at Minden.

3. Britain reaped the fruit of the war by:

(1) Expelling the French from Canada.

(2) Overcoming them in India.

(3) The American War: see below.

ii. Our American Colonies.

1. Early Settlements in America.

(1) The New England States were settled by Puritans—"The Pilgrim Fathers".

(2) Maryland was founded by the Roman Catholics.

(3) Pennsylvania was founded by the Quakers.

(4) The coast lands from the Atlantic to the Alleghany Mts. were held by the British.

(5) The French held Canada.

(6) They also held the lower Mississippi valley.

(7) The French tried to prevent British expansion westward by erecting a chain of forts from Canada to Louisiana.

(8) Fighting at Fort Duquesne—afterwards Pittsburg—on the Ohio, led to open war.

(9) Pitt sent Wolfe to capture Quebec.

(10) By The Treaty of Paris, 1763, all Canada fell into the hand of the British.

2. Causes leading to the American War.

(1) Trade rivalry produced colonial discontent.

(2) The Mercantile System sacrificed all interests to those of the British merchants and manufacturers.

(3) The Stamp Act was passed to tax the colonists directly.

(4) Destruction of the taxed tea cargoes in Boston Harbour.

3. The American War.

(1) Combatants—Britain against the colonists; but soon France, Spain, and Holland join the colonists against us.

(2) Declaration of American Independence, 1776.

(3) Two great British defeats: the capture of Burgoyne at Saratoga, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. The latter was the work of the French fleet, which cut off Cornwallis's supplies by sea.

(4) American Independence acknowledged by Treaty of Versailles, 1783.

iii. The Winning of India:

1. Our Empire in India was founded by private enterprise—by the East India Company.

2. Trading stations—factories—were established in India by English, French, and Dutch traders.

3. Robert Clive turned the tables on Dupleix, the French governor, who designed to drive the English from India.

(1) He captured Arcot, the capital of the Carnatic.

(2) He defeated Surajah Dowlah of the Black Hole infamy at Plassey, and became governor of Bengal.

4. Clive's policy:

(1) He prevented the Company's servants from taking bribes.

(2) He introduced a purer system of justice.

(3) He inaugurated a new policy—that of interfering with native princes in order to acquire territory.

(4) The victory of Wandewash destroyed the French power in India.

5. Warren Hastings was the first Governor-General of India, and formed the design of bringing all India under British rule.

(1) He so protected the Company's territories and procured money for the Court of Directors in England.

(2) He made war on the Mahrattas.

(3) He checked the advances of Hyder Ali in the Carnatic.

(4) He extended British influence in native Indian courts.

(5) Warren Hastings was impeached, on his return to England, for cruelty and oppression, but was acquitted.

6. General Result of the administration of Clive and Hastings—

The East India Company was made the first power in India, and the way was paved for the conquests which so speedily followed.

iv. British Power at Sea, a mixture of success and failure.

1. During the three great eighteenth-century wars:

(1) Great exploits.

1. Anson plundered the Spanish possessions in the Pacific.

2. Hawke defeated the French in Quiberon Bay.

3. The English took Manila and Havannah from the Spaniards.

(2) Failures.

1. Admiral Byng failed to relieve Minorca, and was shot.

2. The French fleet improved, while ours remained stationary.

3. The French seized many of our West Indian islands.

4. The French and Spanish fleets kept up a three years' siege of Gibraltar.

(3) The turning-point is Rodney's victory over De Grasse off Dominica. The new manœuvre of breaking the line made sea-fights decisive.

2. During this century also Captain Cook took possession of Australia and New Zealand in the name of King George—an event of immense importance, though little noted at the time.

XXXI.—THE STRUGGLE AGAINST NAPOLEON

i. General characteristics of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars:

1. They were altogether the greatest of Britain's wars up to that time.

2. More ships and more men were employed than in any previous British war.

3. Vast sums of money were spent on fleets and armies.

4. Enormous sums were also given to the allies of Britain.

5. The National Debt went up by leaps and bounds to £850,000,000.

ii. The leading events may be grouped into five periods.

1. The events of the years 1792–1798:

(1) The French Revolution; French victories over Prussia and Austria; French alliance with Spain and Holland.

(2) Admiral Jervis shattered the French and Spanish fleets off Cape St. Vincent, 1797.

(3) The Mutiny of the Navy at Spithead and the Nore.

(4) Admiral Duncan defeated the Dutch at Camperdown, 1797.

(5) Nelson broke the power of the French in the Mediterranean in the Battle of the Nile, 1798.

2. The events of 1800–1808:

(1) Nelson destroyed the Danish fleet at Copenhagen.

(2) Napoleon massed an army of invasion at Boulogne.

(3) Nelson destroyed the combined fleets of France and Spain off Cape Trafalgar.

(4) Napoleon defeats the Austrians at Austerlitz and the Prussians at Jena.

(5) He issues the Berlin and Milan decrees, and Britain replies with Orders in Council.

3. The Peninsular War, 1808–1813.

(1) The Spaniards rose against the French, and begged help from Britain.

(2) Sir John Moore defeated the French, but was killed in action at Corunna.

(3) Wellington constructed the lines at Torres Vedras, from which no enemy could dislodge him.

(4) Wellington stormed Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz, and defeated the French at Talavera, Salamanca, Vittoria, and finally at Toulouse.

4. Napoleon's expedition to Russia, 1812.

(1) The Grand Army marched into the heart of Russia.

(2) The Russians deserted and set fire to Moscow.

(3) The retreat from Moscow.

(4) The allies—Russia, Austria, Prussia—forced Napoleon to abdicate.

5. The Hundred Days.

(1) Napoleon, having escaped from Elba in 1815, was declared by the allies to be "the common enemy of the world".

(2) Wellington was sent with an army to Belgium.

(3) The Prussians sent to his aid an army under Blücher.

(4) Napoleon defeated Blücher at Ligny.

(5) Wellington crushed Napoleon and the French at Waterloo.

iii. Results of Trafalgar and Waterloo.

1. England was rendered secure from invasion.

2. The supremacy of England at sea was re-established.

3. Great wealth was drawn from a commerce that became world-wide.

4. An unrivalled colonial empire—Greater Britain—sprang up.

XXXII.—THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

1. At the beginning of the eighteenth century

(1) Britain was chiefly an agricultural country.

(2) The iron trade was in a languishing condition.

(3) The linen manufacture, centred chiefly in Scotland and Ireland, was small.

(4) No true cotton fabrics could be manufactured.

(5) Only the woollen trade was fairly prosperous.

2. Inventions and Improvements.

(1) The gigantic industries of Lancashire and Cheshire were due to:

1. Kay's flying shuttle.

2. Hargreaves' spinning-jenny.

3. Arkwright's water-frame.

4. Crompton's mule.

5. Cartwright's power-loom.

6. Tennant's bleaching by chlorine.

(2) The use of coal in smelting and Cort's invention of the puddling process fostered the iron industry.

(3) Wedgwood developed the potteries of Staffordshire.

(4) Roads were made, and Brindley intersected the country by canals.

(5) James Watt's steam-engine led to rapid advances in all industries.

3. Results of this Era of Machinery:

(1) Great industries grew up wherever coal was to be found.

(2) Factory villages became great factory towns—Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Nottingham, &c.

(3) The "by-industries" decayed.

(4) Great hardships to the artisan class resulted from the factory system—remedied, however, by the Factory Acts.

(5) It shifted the industrial centres from the south and east of England to the north and west.

(6) Britain became "the workshop of the world".

XXXIII.—THE DEVELOPMENTS OF PARLIAMENT

i. The Supremacy of Parliament.

1. Though the Revolution had settled the supremacy of Parliament, the Crown could still influence and rule Parliament.

(1) By giving pensions and honours to members and their friends.

(2) By promotions in the army and navy.

2. Men saw that Parliament did not represent the people, and that the power of the Crown ought to be diminished.

(1) Many of the great new industrial centres—Birmingham, Leeds, Manchester—had no members.

(2) Small boroughs returned two.

(3) Even large towns and counties had few electors (Edinburgh had a member to itself, but Glasgow had only a fourth share in a member).

(4) "Pocket Boroughs" were numerous.

(5) Bribery and corrupt practices were almost universal.

ii. Reform.

1. The French Revolution delayed Reform in England for nearly forty years.

2. The Reform Bill of 1831, passed the Commons, but was thrown out by the Lords.

3. Riots, almost approaching revolution, broke out all over England.

4. A threat to create new Peers made the Lords give way, and

The First Reform Bill was passed in 1832.

(1) Members were taken from rotten boroughs.

(2) Members were given to large towns and counties.

(3) The Franchise was extended—so as to include shopkeepers, the richer artisans, farmers, &c.

5. The franchise has been three times lowered since then—in 1867, in 1884, and in 1918—so that Britain is now in reality a democratic country.

XXXIV.—EPOCH OF REFORM

1. The Reform Bill was only the first of many measures of a similar kind.
2. It was followed by the Factory Acts, dealing with the ages, hours, &c., of the workers.
3. Among other reforms of the time were:
 - (1) Reform in the Criminal Law.
 - (2) Reform in the Poor-law.
 - (3) The Catholic Emancipation Act (1829).
 - (4) The abolition of the slave-trade (1807) and slavery (1834).
 - (5) The introduction of the penny-postage system (1840).
4. The abolition of the Corn-laws and the alteration of the Navigation Acts led to the establishment of free-trade.

XXXV.—THE CRIMEAN WAR AND THE INDIAN MUTINY

i. The Crimean War.

1. Causes:
 - (1) The desire of Russia to become mistress of Constantinople.
 - (2) The Czar demanded the right of protecting the Christians of Turkey.
 - (3) Jealousy of the growing power and influence of Russia.
 - (4) Napoleon III's desire for military glory.
2. Leading events in the Crimean War:
 - (1) Victory of the British and French at Alma.
 - (2) Bombardment of Sebastopol.
 - (3) Charge of the Light Brigade at Balaclava.
 - (4) The Battle of Inkerman—"the soldiers' battle".
 - (5) The fall of Sebastopol.

3. Results:

- (1) Many reforms were carried out at the War Office.
- (2) Florence Nightingale's example proved a new departure in army nursing.

- (3) Newspaper correspondents first began to play an important part in war.

(4) The Treaty of Paris.

1. Russia gave up her claim to interfere with Turkey.
2. The Black Sea was made neutral.
3. The navigation of the Danube was made free.
4. Roumania and Servia obtained freedom.

ii. The Indian Mutiny.

1. Causes:

- (1) British interference with native habits, customs, and beliefs.
- (2) The exclusion of natives from the higher posts in the civil service.
- (3) The dissatisfaction of the many dethroned princes.
- (4) The withdrawing of the ablest men from the army for civil posts, and the weakening of the army by the Persian expedition.
- (5) The issue of cartridges supposed to be greased with the fat of cows and pigs was the immediate cause of the outbreak.
- (6) It was thought by many that the British power was declining.

2. Leading Events of the Mutiny.

- (1) Outbreaks at Meerut, Delhi, Lucknow, and Cawnpore, 1857.
- (2) Massacre at Cawnpore.
- (3) Capture of Delhi.
- (4) Relief of Lucknow by Havelock, Outram, and Campbell.

3. Results:

- (1) Indian administration placed under the control of the Crown.
- (2) The East India Company dissolved. Governor-Gen. made Viceroy.
- (3) Native army much reduced.

XXXVI.—PALMERSTON; DISRAELI; GLADSTONE

After Peel; who carried Catholic Emancipation and the Abolition of the Corn-laws, Britain has had three eminent statesmen in the House of Commons:

1. Lord Palmerston.

- (1) He brought the Crimean War to a successful end.

- (2) He piloted the country safely through all the dangers of the Indian Mutiny.

2. Gladstone.

- (1) He was Chancellor of the Exchequer under Palmerston.
- (2) Gladstone's policy was—"Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform".
- (3) He passed the Education Act (Mr. Forster's), and the Ballot Act.
- (4) He abolished the system of Army Purchase.
- (5) He disestablished the Irish Protestant Church.
- (6) He carried an Irish Land Act.
- (7) He wrecked the old Liberal party by his action in connection with Home Rule for Ireland.

3. Disraeli.

- (1) At first leader of the Protectionists.
- (2) Soon set to work to "educate his party" to rival the Liberals in granting reforms, e.g. the Reform Bill of 1867.
- (3) Was Imperialist in policy.
- (4) His firmness in dealing with Russia led to good results in the Treaty of Berlin.

XXXVII.—BRITISH POWER IN AFRICA

1. The Expansion of Europe.

- (1) Britain, Germany, France, Italy, all extended their spheres of influence or occupation in Africa.
- (2) Russia steadily advanced eastward and southward in Asia.
- (3) These European powers all sought ports, stations, privileges, and spheres of influence in China.

2. The Scramble for Africa.

- (1) The English obtained Cape Colony from the Dutch in 1815.
- (2) The discovery of diamonds at Kimberley led to the annexation of Griqualand.
- (3) Under Disraeli, Zululand and the Transvaal—a Boer state—were annexed.
- (4) Freedom, with certain restrictions, was restored to the Boers of the Transvaal.

- (5) The discovery of gold on the Rand and the influx of thousands of Britons—Uitlanders—into the Transvaal, where they were refused the most elementary rights, was followed by the Jameson Raid, and later by the Boer War, 1899-1902.

- (6) Mr. Cecil Rhodes extended British rule over Rhodesia, North and South. He planned also a railway to join the Cape to Cairo. The railway has made considerable progress.

3. Egypt.

- (1) Britain and France set up "The Dual Control", to prevent the country being misgoverned, and to secure the repayment of Egyptian bonds.
- (2) On the rebellion of Arabi Pasha in 1882 France withdrew from the Dual Control, and left Britain to put down the rebellion and restore order. This led to the British occupation of the country.

4. The Sudan.

- (1) In 1883 the Madhi defeated Hicks Pasha at Shekan, and, later, having captured Khartoum and killed General Gordon, tried to invade Egypt itself.
- (2) The Dervishes, kept in check by British and Egyptian forces, were in 1898 defeated by the Sirdar (Lord Kitchener) at Khartoum, and the Sudan, which had been lost, was recaptured.

XXXVIII.—THE NEW COLONIAL SYSTEM

1. The new Colonial System consists mainly in giving the colonies self-government, while Britain supports and protects them.

2. Canada.

- (1) Divided by Pitt's Canada Act of 1791 into Upper Canada and Lower Canada, the colony grew discontented, as was shown in 1838.
- (2) On Lord Durham's report and advice the colonies were united in 1840 and were given complete self-government.
- (3) The Dominion of Canada, formed in 1867 by the British North America Act, embraces all British Colonies in North America except Newfoundland, the Bermudas, and the Bahamas.

3. Australia.

- (1) Settlements formed towards the end of the eighteenth century were, as population increased, made separate colonies.
- (2) Rapid increase in population, after gold discoveries towards the middle of nineteenth century, led to great development of trade and commerce.
- (3) Following example of Canada, Commonwealth of Australia formed, in 1900.

4. South Africa.

- (1) Great Boer War from 1899-1902, ended by Peace of Vereeniging.
- (2) The union of South Africa formed in 1910.

5. New Zealand.

- (1) Annexed in 1840.
- (2) Maori War, 1861-1871.
- (3) Constituted a Dominion, 1907.

6. Future of the Empire.

- (1) Existence of Empire due not merely to courage and enterprise of our people, but also to the wisdom and sense of duty which have animated them, and to their spirit of tolerance.
- (2) On the maintenance of these characteristics the future of the Empire depends.

XXXIX.—THE MARCH OF EVENTS

1. Queen Victoria.

- (1) Queen died in 1901. Steady progress during her reign. Constitution remained in a sense intact.
- (2) The throne during her reign became more popular, and the colonies more loyal.

2. Social Legislation.

- (1) Comparative political quiet ended in 1906. Radicals returned to power with a huge majority.
- (2) Old Age Pensions and National Insurance led to increased taxation and to bitter disputes.
- (3) Radical party supported by Labour party and Irish Home Rule party.
- (4) Lords refused to pass the Budget of 1909.

3. The Parliament Act.

- (1) Act passed by coalition of Radicals, Labour members, and Irish Home Rulers.

- (2) House of Lords can no longer reject a Bill and so force appeal to country; it can only delay the passing of a measure.

- (3) Britain has no longer a two-chamber government.

4. Home Rule.

- (1) Under the Parliament Act the Home Rule Bill became law in 1914.

5. The Entente Cordiale.

- (1) Britain up till the reign of King Edward held aloof from Continental affairs.
- (2) King Edward won over the French, who were sore about Egypt and the Sudan, and Britain entered into a friendship with that country known as the Entente Cordiale.

XL.—THE GREAT WAR AND AFTER

1. Triple Entente.

- (1) Support of France in Morocco and frank discussion with Russia of our interests in Asia led to the formation of the Triple Entente, as a balance to the Triple Alliance of the powers of Central Europe.

2. European War.

- (1) The struggle against Turkey by the Balkan States, the overthrow of the Turkish power in Europe, and the quarrel of allies over the spoils left matters very unstable.
 - (2) Austria, in revenge for the assassination of the heir to her throne, demanded a submission from Servia which she could not give and remain independent.
 - (3) Germany, which was pushing on Austria, issued an ultimatum to France and Russia.
 - (4) German violation of Belgian neutrality forced Britain to declare war upon her on Aug. 4, 1914.
- Aug. 16, 1914.—Expeditionary Force landed in France.
- Aug. 23, 1914.—British Retreat from Mons began.
- Sept. 6, 1914.—Battle of the Marne begun.
- Oct. 20, 1914.—First Battle of Ypres begun.
- April 22, 1915.—Second Battle of Ypres begun.
- April 25, 1915.—Landing in Gallipoli.
- Jan. 8, 1916.—Evacuation of Gallipoli.

May 31, 1916—Battle of Jutland.
 July 1, 1916—Battle of the Somme begun.
 July 31, 1917—Third Battle of Ypres begun.
 March 31, 1918—Great German Offensive begun in the West.

July 18, 1918—Foch's Counter-attack on the Marne.
 Nov. 11, 1918—Armistice terms accepted by Germany.
 June 28, 1919—Peace signed at Versailles.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

I.—THE ROMAN PERIOD (43-410)

B.C.

55. First Landing of Julius Cæsar in Britain.

54. Second Landing of Julius Cæsar in Britain.

A.D.

43. Re-invasion by the Romans, and Conquest of South Britain.

84. Agricola, Roman Governor of Britain, defeated the Caledonians in the battle of Mons Grampius.

120. Hadrian's Wall—stone wall and earthen rampart—built from the Solway Firth to the mouth of the Tyne.

410. Withdrawal of the Romans from Britain; Rome captured by the Goths; Fall of the Western Roman Empire (477 A.D.).

II.—THE OLD ENGLISH PERIOD (449-1066)

449. English Conquest of South Britain began with the landing of the Jutes under Hengist and Horsa in Kent.

597. Introduction of Christianity into Kent by Augustine, sent from Rome by Pope Gregory.

(d. 597). St. Columba, abbot of Iona, founded Celtic Christian Church in northern Britain.

(d. 651). St. Aidan from Scotland found Christian Church in Northumbria.

664. Synod of Whitby decided in favour of the Roman ritual and time for keeping Easter.

787. First Invasion of the Northmen.

827. Egbert, King of the West Saxons, became king of the English south of the Thames, and overlord of all the English as far as the Firth of Forth.

A.D.

843. Union of the Picts and Scots under Kenneth MacAlpine.

878. Northmen, under Guthrum, invaded Wessex: Alfred retreated to Athelney, Battle of Ethandun; Treaty of Wedmore.

945. Edmund conquered Cumberland, which he gave to Malcolm, King of Scots, on military tenure.

966. Edgar divided Northumbria, and granted Lothian to Kenneth, King of Scots, to be held by him as vassal.

1002. Massacre of the Danes on St. Brice's Day.

1017. Canute, the Dane, chosen king of all England.

1042. English line of kings restored in the person of Edward the Confessor.

1066. The Norman Conquest.

Harold defeated Tostig and the Northmen at Stamford Bridge. Battle of Senlac or Hastings. Harold killed. William accepted as king.

III.—THE NORMAN PERIOD (1066-1154)

1066. The Norman Conquest.

1078. Rebellion of William's son.

1086. Domesday Book—a general survey of England—produced; Great Court held at Salisbury.

1100. Henry I married Matilda, daughter of Malcolm of Scotland.

1138. David of Scotland defeated in the Battle of the Standard.

IV.—THE PLANTAGENET PERIOD (1154-1399)

- A.D.
 1157. Malcolm, King of Scots, did homage to Henry II for the earldom of Huntingdon.
 1159. Scutage—a payment in money instead of military service—first regularly instituted.
 1162. Thomas Becket elected Archbishop of Canterbury.
 1164. The Constitutions of Clarendon.
 1170. Becket murdered at Canterbury.
 1171. Henry visited Ireland; his supremacy acknowledged by the chiefs.
 1174. William the Lion captured near Alnwick; set free by Treaty of Falaise on condition of doing homage for Scotland.
 1191. Acre, in Palestine, captured by Richard I.
 1208. England placed under an Interdict by the Pope.
 1215. The Great Charter signed by King John at Runnymede.
 1257. Simon de Montfort assumed the leadership of the opposition to Henry III.
 1258. The Mad Parliament drew up the Provisions of Oxford.
 1264. The barons victorious in the Battle of Lewes.
 1265. Representatives from boroughs and cities summoned for the first time to Parliament; Battle of Evesham.
 1282. The Conquest of Wales.
 1291. Meeting at Norham with the Scots; Edward's claim to decide the succession acknowledged.
 1295. First complete Parliament—"the Model Parliament"—of the Three Estates.
 1296. Scots defeated in the Battle of Dunbar; Balliol dethroned.
 1297. Wallace victorious in the Battle of Stirling Bridge or Cambuskenneth.
 1298. Wallace defeated at Falkirk.
 1304. Stirling Castle taken by the English; conquest of Scotland completed.
 1305. Wallace captured and executed at London.
 1306. Robert Bruce crowned at Scone; defeated at Methuen.
 1314. Battle of Bannockburn; establishment of Scottish independence

- A.D.
 1328. The Independence of Scotland recognized by Edward III.
 1333. Scots defeated at Halidon Hill. Balliol reinstated.
 1338. Beginning of the Hundred Years' War with France.
 1346. Battle of Cressy; David II defeated at Nevill's Cross and taken prisoner.
 1349. The Black Death; the Statute of Labourers.
 1356. Battle of Poitiers.
 1381. Rising of the Commons under Wat Tyler.
 1388. The Raid of Otterburn.
 1393. The Statute of Praemunire.

V.—THE HOUSE OF LANCASTER (1399-1461)

1402. Scots defeated at Homildon Hill.
 1403. Conspiracy of the Percies; Battle of Shrewsbury; Harry Percy ("Hotspur") killed.
 1415. Battle of Agincourt.
 1420. Treaty of Troyes signed.
 1421. English defeated at Beaugé by French, aided by a body of Scots.
 1429. The Siege of Orleans raised by Jeanne Darc.
 1450. Rebellion headed by Jack Cade.
 1453. Final loss of France, Calais alone remaining.
 1455. Beginning of the Wars of the Roses.

VI.—THE HOUSE OF YORK (1461-1485)

1471. Printing introduced in England by William Caxton.
 { Henry of Richmond invaded England.
 1485. { Battle of Bosworth.
 { End of the Wars of the Roses.

VII.—THE TUDOR PERIOD (1485-1603)

1487. Lambert Simnel proclaimed king as Edward VI.
 1492. Perkin Warbeck, another impostor landed in Ireland.
 1502. Margaret Tudor married James IV of Scotland.
 1513. Battle of Flodden.
 1520. Henry VIII met King Francis on "The Field of the Cloth of Gold".

A.D.

1529. Fall of Wolsey.
 1532. Beginning of the Reformation in England.
 1535. Henry VIII took the title of "Supreme Head of the Church in England".
 1539. All monasteries suppressed.
 1541. Henry VIII declared King of Ireland.
 1542. Scots routed at Solway Moss.
 1547. Scots defeated at the Battle of Pinkie.
 1549. The first Prayer-book of Edward VI approved.
 1554. Lady Jane Grey executed.
 1555. The Marian persecution began.
 1558. Calais captured by the French.
 1559. Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity passed.
 1563. The Thirty - nine Articles drawn up and signed.
 1587. Execution of Mary Queen of Scots.
 1588. Defeat of the Spanish Armada.

VIII.—THE STUART PERIOD (1603-1714)

1604. The Hampton Court Conference.
 1605. The Gunpowder Plot discovered.
 1618. Execution of Sir Walter Raleigh.
 1621. Bacon, Lord Chancellor, impeached.
 1628. Charles I assented to the Petition of Right.
 1637. John Hampden refused to pay ship-money.
 1640. The Long Parliament met.
 1644. Battle of Marston Moor.
 1645. Battle of Naseby; Montrose defeated at Philiphaugh.
 1649. Charles I executed; Drogheda sacked.
 1650. Scots defeated at Battle of Dunbar.
 1651. Charles defeated at the Battle of Worcester.
 1653. Dutch Naval War.
 1660. The Restoration.
 1665. The Great Plague of London.
 1666. The Great Fire of London.
 1667. The Cabal Ministry.
 1672. The Declaration of Indulgence.
 1673. Test Act passed.
 1679. Habeas Corpus Act passed.
 1680. The Exclusion Bill rejected by the Lords.

A.D.

1685. Insurrection of Monmouth; Battle of Sedgemoor; the Bloody Assizes.
 1688. The Seven Bishops tried and acquitted.
Revolution: William Prince of Orange invited to invade England; James deposed.
 1689. The Declaration of Right.
 1690. Battle of the Boyne.
 1692. Massacre of Glencoe; Naval battle off La Hogue.
 1693. Origin of the National Debt.
 1694. The Bank of England established.
 1697. The Peace of Ryswick.
 1701. The Act of Settlement passed.
 1702. War of the Spanish Succession began.
 1704. Battle of Blenheim; Capture of Gibraltar; Scottish Act of Security.
 1706. Battle of Ramillies.
 1707. Act of Union between England and Scotland.
 1708. Battle of Oudenarde.
 1709. Battle of Malplaquet.
 1713. The Treaty of Utrecht.

IX.—THE HOUSE OF HANOVER (1714-1917)

1715. Defeat of the Jacobites at Preston; Sheriffmuir; The Riot Act.
 1716. The Septennial Parliament Bill passed.
 1720. The South Sea Company purchased from Government part of the national debt.
 1736. The Porteous Riots in Edinburgh.
 1743. George II defeated the French at Dettingen—the last time an English sovereign personally led troops to battle.
 1745. The English defeated by the French at Fontenoy. Charles Edward Stuart defeated Cope at Prestonpans.
 1746. Charles defeated Hawley at Falkirk. Charles was finally defeated at Culloden.
 1748. Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle.
 1756. The French captured Minorca. The Black Hole of Calcutta.
 1759. The Capture of Quebec by Wolfe.
 1763. The Treaty of Paris—End of the Seven Years' War.
 1765. The Stamp Act for America passed.
 1776. American Independence declared.

- A.D.
 1780 Spanish fleet defeated by Rodney off Cape St. Vincent.
 1781. Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown.
 1782. Britain acknowledged the Independence of the United States.
 1789. The French Revolution.
 1795. The Cape of Good Hope captured from the Dutch.
 1797. Naval victories off St. Vincent and off Camperdown.
 1798. The Battle of the Nile.
 1800. The Act for the Union of Great Britain and Ireland passed.
 1801. Defeat of the French at Alexandria, and of the Danish fleet at Copenhagen.
 1805. The French and Spanish fleets defeated off Trafalgar.
 1809. Defeat of the French at Corunna; Sir John Moore killed.
 1812. The storming of Badajos; the victory of Salamanca; the burning of Moscow.
 1813. The Battle of Vittoria.
 1814. Wellington defeated Soult at Toulouse; abdication of Napoleon.
 1815. Complete defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo.
 1829. The Catholic Emancipation Bill passed.
 1832. The Reform Bill passed.
 1833. An Act for the Emancipation of Slaves passed.
 1837. Hanover separated from England.
 1846. The Bill for the gradual Repeal of the Corn-laws passed.
 1854. The Battles of Alma, Balaclava, Inkerman.
 1855. The Fall of Sebastopol.
 1857. The Indian Mutiny—the capture of Delhi, the massacre at Cawnpore, the relief of Lucknow.
 1862. The Cotton Famine in Lancashire, caused by the Civil War in America, 1861-1865.
 1870. The Irish Land Act and the Elementary Education Act passed.
 1878. The Congress of Berlin to settle the Russo-Turkish difficulty. Afghan War started.
 1882. Arabi defeated at Tel-el-Kebir.
 1885. Death of Gen. Gordon at Khartoum.
 1886. Defeat of the Gladstone Scheme for Home Rule in Ireland.

- A.D.
 1889. County Councils Act passed.
 1894. Parish Councils Act passed.
 1898. Battle of Omdurman—Re-conquest of the Sudan.
 1899. Boers declared war. Lady-smith, Kimberley, and Mafeking besieged.
 1900. Towns relieved; Bloemfontein and Pretoria captured; Transvaal and Orange Free State proclaimed British territory.
 1901. January 22, Death of Queen Victoria. Accession of Edward VII.
 1902. Peace with Boers signed at Pretoria (May 31).
 1903. King Edward's Continental tour.
 1904. Agreements re arbitration entered into by Britain with France, Italy, Germany, &c.
 Russian Baltic squadron fires on Gamecock fishing fleet.
 1905. Aliens Bill passed; Workmen's Unemployed Bill passed. New Anglo-Japanese Agreement.
 1906. New Parliament. Great Radical majority; Education Bill dropped; Territorial and Reserve Forces Bill passed.
 1907. Visit of Prince Fushimi of Japan. Anglo-Russian agreement.
 1908. Old Age Pensions Bill passed.
 1909. Arbitration Treaty with United States signed; South African Union formed.
 1910. Death of Edward VII and accession of George V; Veto Bill introduced; rejected by Lords.
 1911. Declaration of London condemned by imperial conference; National Insurance Bill introduced; Royal Coronation; Coronation Durbar at Delhi; Germany interferes in Morocco.
 1912. Ulster Anti-Home Rule campaign.
 1913. Trades Unions empowered to use funds for political purposes.
 1914. Germany forces on a war with Russia and France, invades Belgium, and so compels Britain to declare war.
 British Protectorate over Egypt.
 1916. Irish rebellion in Dublin.
 1917. British armies capture Baghdad. Occupy Palestine.
 (July) Name of Royal House changed to House of Windsor.

X.—THE HOUSE OF WINDSOR

A.D.

1918. Women Franchise established in United Kingdom.

November 11, Germans surrender, accepting Armistice terms.

1919. German delegates sign the Peace terms at Versailles, June 28.

German fleet scuttled in Scapa Flow.

Aeroplane flight across the Atlantic.

1920. First Assembly of the League of Nations.

Northern Ireland Parliament set up.

1921. Coal strike.

Disarmament conference at Washington.

A.D.

1922. Conference of nations at Genoa.
Irish Free State constituted.

Egypt declared independent.

London "Reparations" conference.

1923. Treaty of Lausanne.

Imperial and Economic Conferences.

1924. Labour Government in Great Britain.

British Empire Exhibition at Wembley.

League Conference at Geneva.

Conservative Government succeeds Labour.

1925. Mr. Asquith made Earl of Oxford
Locarno Treaty signed.William I 1066archbishopWilliam II Rufus 1087kingHenry I 1100Stephen 1135Henry II 1154Richard I 1188John 1199Henry III 1216

TILLAGE, TRADE, AND INVENTION

AN OUTLINE OF INDUSTRIAL HISTORY

BY

GEORGE TOWNSEND WARNER, M.A.

Late Master of the Modern Side at Harrow School; Author of "A Brief Survey of British History" "Landmarks in English Industrial History" &c. Joint-Author of "The Groundwork of British History"

With sixteen full-page Illustrations and Questions for Individual Study. Price 3s.

The aim of this book is to give a simple account of our Industrial History; of the land and those who worked it; of the towns and their trade; of our industries and their expansion; and of the steadily widening circle of British commerce.

Perhaps the best equipment in the education of a good citizen is a general idea of how his country has grown to be what it is, and an honest attempt to understand the different opinions which men of the past have held upon the constantly recurring problems of land, labour, and industrial enterprise.

"A very readable and, indeed, most interesting epitome. Practically no phase of the subject is untouched; the rural occupations of the Saxons; the gradual rise of trade and commerce; the Merchant and Craft Guilds; the Elizabethan social legislation; the Industrial Revolution; the development of machinery and of the means of traffic; combines, trade unions and strikes are all dealt with in a manner which indicates the possession of full knowledge on the part of the author."—Education.

"An excellent little book in which a great deal of information on a side of history too often neglected has been compressed into a small space, and the story is told in an attractive way."—Times.

SOCIAL LIFE IN ENGLAND

THROUGH THE CENTURIES

By H. R. WILTON HALL

Librarian, Hertfordshire County Museum; Sub-Librarian, St. Alban's Cathedral

With Sixteen Full-page Plates and Numerous Illustrations in the text, and Test Questions for Individual Study. 2s. 9d.

There has lately been a very marked development of interest in local history, and with it a desire not merely to know more about the past, but a desire to appreciate intelligently the real value of those things, still to be seen, which speak of the gradual building up of the social life of the Nation.

This book is intended to be suggestive, to stimulate interest and an intelligent curiosity in the development of Social Life in England. It is liberally illustrated with drawings, many of them from ancient sources, and a series of full-page photographs of places of historical interest.

"We can recommend this book most cordially to all who are interested in the history of our English social customs. The charming illustrations give an additional value to the book, and no one can fail to appreciate the care and scholarship which have gone to the making of this little work on English social life."—Education.

"Mr. Hall, in the very charming book before us, treats of things so various as pit-dwellings, earthworks, Roman villas, English towns, Norman castles, Tudor houses, fairs, markets, churches, roads, and railways. Whatever he touches he makes interesting, and he illuminates his pages with many delightful photographs and prints."—Journal of Education.

"A sound book . . . which throws sidelights upon the English past often quite neglected by history textbooks. Mr. Hall begins at the very beginning with the relics of palæolithic man from whom he leads us step by step to the present."—Times.

55 B.C. Romans ✓

410 Romans left ✓

563 St Columba ✓

597 St Augustine ✓

844

Kenneth united Picts and Scots ✓

849

James Angles & Saxons ✓

878

Treaty of Wedmore ✓

1018

Scotland united ✓ 1066

Norman conquest ✓

1138

Standard ✓

1174

Treaty of Falaise ✓

1189

Richard came throne 3rd crusade ✓

1215 magna carta ✓

1258 Provisions of Oxford ✓

1295 model Parliament Franco Scottish alliance ✓

1297

Stirling ✓

1306

Bruce came to throne ✓

1328

Treaty of Northampton ✓

1338

Hundred Year's War ✓

1346

Battle of Crécy ✓

1356

Battle of Poitiers ✓

1431

Joan of Arc burned ✓

1458

End of Hundred Year's War ✓

1415

Battle of Agincourt ✓

ANDREW BAXENDINE & SONS, SCHOOL & COLLEGE BOOKSELLERS, 15 CHAMBERS STREET,
EDINBURGH.

They. You. We.

